

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

SPAIN—THE THRONE OF SPAIN. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, I have given private Notice to the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary of my intention to ask him, Whether it would be consistent with his duty to make a statement to your Lordships with respect to the complications which have unfortunately arisen between the three Courts of Spain, France, and Prussia? I feel I need make no apology for putting the Question, for the news which we have received to-day from abroad, as stated in the public prints of the state of public feeling in France, is most alarming. That news goes, indeed, so far as to make it almost probable—certainly possible—that a great European war may follow on these events. We are told that, in consequence of—I suppose I must use the words—secret negotiation between the Prime Minister of Spain and the House of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, an hereditary Prince of that House has consented to accept the Throne of Spain if offered to him by the Cortes. This negotiation, it appears, has been going on totally unknown to France, and, as I understand, to the other great Powers of Europe; and the consequence is, that not only the manner in which the negotiation has been carried on, but also its substance, has been most offensive to France. I will not, of course, ask my noble Friend to express any opinion how serious the effect of these complications may be or how they will end. We must make allowance for the prejudices and traditions of other countries, even though we do not completely understand them. At all events, I may be permitted to say that considering all that has passed with reference to the vacant Throne of Spain, it might have been expected by all the great Powers that negotiations should have been carried on above board and in a fair manner. I will only ask the noble Earl whether he can give us any hope that by his own exertions and those of Her Majesty's Government, and through the exertions of the other great Powers, the great danger which we all regret to look at is likely to pass away? I would also ask where and when Her Majesty's Government were first informed of these negotiations?

EARL GRANVILLE: On the last occasion when I remarked on the custom of putting Questions without Notice, I was not aware, or had forgotten, that the Standing Order adopted by your Lordships had gone further than the recommendation of the Select Committee; I believe, however, that I shall meet your Lordships' wishes by giving some answer to a Question put by a noble Earl who has so much right to put one on foreign affairs and on so very important a subject—though, as your Lordships will readily conceive, that answer must necessarily be very short and somewhat meagre. I had the honour of receiving the seals of the Foreign Office last Wednesday. On the previous day I had an unofficial communication with the able and experienced Under Secretary, Mr. Hammond, at the Foreign Office, and he told me, it being then 3 or 4 o'clock, that with the exception of the sad and painful subject about to be discussed this evening, he had never during his long experience known so great a lull in foreign affairs, and that he was not aware of any important question that I should have to deal with. At 6 o'clock that evening, when we were about to begin the discussion on the Report of the Irish Land Bill, I received a telegram informing me of the choice which had been made by the Provisional Government of Spain of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, and of his acceptance of the offer. I went to Windsor the following day and had the honour of receiving the seals of the Foreign Office from Her Majesty. On my return I saw the Marquis de Lavalette, who informed me of the fact which I already knew, and in energetic terms remarked on the great indignity thus offered to France, and expressed the determination of the Government of the Emperor not to permit the project to be carried out. M. Lavalette added that he trusted Her Majesty's Government, considering its friendly relations with France and its general desire to maintain peace, would use its influence with the other parties concerned. I told M. de Lavalette that the announcement had taken the Prime Minister and myself entirely by surprise. I stated that I could not admit the force of all the arguments he had used, and that I wished to reserve my opinion as to the general question. I expressed my regret that such strong language had been used at the outset of the affair by the French Government; but I admitted the existence of a strong and excited public opinion in France, and stated that for the reasons which he gave—namely, our friendly relations with France and our anxious desire to contribute to the maintenance of European peace—I would endeavour, without dictation and without any undue interference with the position of other countries, to impress upon them to the utmost the necessity of examining this important subject under all its serious phases. These are the principles on which Her Majesty's Government have since acted. I have been in communication not only with France, Prussia, and Spain, but also with the other great Powers, or their representatives, and I have no reason to believe that any one of those Powers is otherwise than anxious to maintain peace and desirous to contribute its share in preserving it. It is impossible for me to give any opinion to-day as to what effect those efforts may have had; but I do trust in the sense and moderation of the rulers and statesmen of Europe to avert so great a calamity as war. We all know how causes trivial in themselves, how faults and misunderstandings on both sides, have led to some of the greatest calamities which Europe has suffered; but I think there ought to be found some means of arriving at a conclusion which should avert the result to which the noble Earl has alluded.

GREECE—MURDER OF BRITISH SUBJECTS BY BRIGANDS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE: My Lords, it is with much sincere reluctance that I come forward to redeem the pledge which I gave in laying on your Lordships' Table the Notice of my present Motion. At this late period of the Session, when several important Bills remain to be discussed, I feel extremely unwilling to solicit your Lordships' attention even for a brief space on a question of foreign interest. But if I venture, nevertheless, to do so, I hope your Lordships will appreciate the sense of duty which makes me overstep every other consideration. Had those outrageous murders, which have raised so loud a cry of horror and indignation throughout the length and breadth of the land, been perpetrated in any country but Greece, I should not, my Lords, have troubled you with the Motion, which I am now prepared to submit to your Lordships. I have no complaint to make, no mistrust to express of Her Majesty's Government. They and their agents abroad appear to have exerted their best energies to obtain the punishment of the murderers and the discovery of their secret accomplices. This just acknowledgment is more particularly due to the memory of that distinguished Minister who has been called away so suddenly from among us, whose loss is indeed supplied by a hopeful reliance on his noble successor, but over whom we must still throw back our regrets in the recollection of those efficient and attractive qualities by which he refreshed the lustre of an historic title and justified the sorrow of his numerous friends.

There is happily no reason for me to distress your Lordships by going again in detail over the scene of crime and blood. The particulars of the outrage and its attendant complications were fully, ably, and impressively stated on a former occasion by the noble Earl on the Bench behind me, and ample justice has been done to the exemplary conduct of its victims under so awful a visitation. I cannot, however, disguise the impressions left upon my mind by a perusal of the official documents laid upon your Lordships' Table. To use the mildest language, there is no denying that the Greek Ministers exhibited a culpable degree of carelessness in the outset, that secret intrigues were employed to render the brigands intractable, and, finally, that gross mismanagement, however unintended, brought to its fatal point the impending catastrophe.

What we have now to deal with is that system of organized crime but too well known under the name of Brigandage. I need not remind your Lordships that wherever that evil exists, the country, in proportion to its prevalence there, suffers more or less in all the main sources of national prosperity. The land is neglected; industry is checked; and the people are degraded in their habits and moral temperament. Italy, Spain, Hungary, and Turkey, as well as Greece, continue to give evidence of this truth, and great would be the benefit accruing to those countries if their respective Governments could be induced to combine their measures by mutual agreement for the extirpation of a canker at once so vile and so destructive. In Greece the baneful practice has long taken root, and spread its branches to a frightful extent. The late disgusting murders were its legitimate offspring. It has a character peculiar to itself, and dates from the earliest period of Grecian life. The poets and historians of Greece bear witness to its antiquity, and to the evil effects it produced, whether as piracy at sea, or as banded robbery on shore. Unfortunately the geographical configuration of Greece, whether insular or continental, comes in aid of the traditional habits of its people. Long mountainous ridges in the one case, and rocky islands separated by narrow seas in the other, nourish the spirit of adventure, and while they supply motives for a life of spoliation, oppose a barrier to the pursuit of avenging justice. The northern highlands of Greece are, moreover, connected with similar mountains in Turkey. The inhabitants on both sides of the frontier are generally few and scattered. For the most part they are shepherds, and whether the flocks they tend are their own, or only consigned to their care, they lead a wandering life, directed in their movements by the seasons, or by their access to localities abounding in pasture. Would that they were as innocent as their flocks! Unhappily, they not only supply the brigands with intelligence, and occasionally with food, but also from time to time they serve themselves to recruit the plundering bands, as appeared to demonstration from the late trials at Athens. It is their practice to send milk for sale to the towns, and the carriers, whom they employ for that purpose, are the channels of communication between the brigands and their secret accomplices. The owners of the pasture lands have also a motive for being on friendly terms with the robbers. Their farms not unfrequently lie in exposed situations, and in order to save their property from dangerous visits they connive at acts of depredation, and sometimes go so far as to play into the hands of those who commit them.

Worse, my Lords, even than this fellowship of crime is the political corruption which arises from the same source. The return of a candidate for election as a Deputy is rendered uncertain by the progress of some opponent in obtaining promises. The case is urgent. What is to be done? The frightened candidate happens to have means of communication with some band of freebooters quartered in the neighbourhood. He applies for their assistance; they assail his rival and his rival's supporters with threatening letters, and sometimes proceed even to a partial execution of their menace. The candidate, converted by their agency into an elected Deputy, is bound to treat them with gratitude. He gives his support to some Minister, and that Minister is bound in turn to listen to the suggestions of his friend, who employs his influence, as the case may be, to save or to serve the brigands at a pinch. The Deputy may also be a magistrate, and in that case the current of justice is more immediately distorted on behalf of crime. The disastrous consequences of this vast network of plunder, bloodshed, corruption, and political intrigue may be easily conceived, at the same time that the practice in its full extent reflects a strong light on those suspicious inadvertencies which, as your Lordships may remember, formed the worst part of the late transactions in Greece. The development of the natural resources of the country is neglected; the mass of its inhabitants, perverted by evil examples, discouraged by a sense of insecurity, and enervated by terror, recede from every wholesome exertion; and the administration of the Government is tainted to its very core with false ideas which re-act with pa-ralyzing force alike on the land and on its population.

When the late King Otho, on the termination of his minority, mounted the Throne of Greece, he found himself in front of two parties, each pretending, on grounds of its own, to an ascendancy in the conduct of public affairs. The one was composed, with few exceptions, of Greeks from Constantinople and the Ionian Islands, intermingled with Native proprietors from the Morea and Archipelago Islands, who had taken a lead in the insurrectionary Administrations and Legislatures during their struggle for independence; the other, of those who pretended to be descendants of the real offspring of the soil, mountaineers of Northern Greece, men of those regions which had contributed the largest amount of muscle and hardihood to the war with Turkey, belonging by nature to the military class, fond of action, and sympathizing with freebooters, even when they were not members themselves of some pillaging, cut-throat band. The young Sovereign, whatever may have been his motive, favoured this latter division of his people. It may be that he shrank from the restraints of a constitutional form of government, to which the former party were inclined, or sought to flatter the national vanity by taking up the Grande Idée, as it was called, and together with it the class which adopted it as their watch-word and party cry. He wore the justanelle himself; he showed a greater preference for Colletti, the Albanian, than for Mauvocoordato, the constitutional leader, and treated the freebooters with a degree of leniency which at once encouraged both their criminal trade, and the lawless policy of which they were thought by many to be the eventual instruments. From this mistaken policy, my Lords, as from a fountain head came forth a stream of evils affecting both the internal condition and the foreign relations of Greece. From the very beginning there was a signal want of economy little suited to the financial means of the country. Too large a portion of the revenue was laid out upon troops and diplomacy. At a later period fruitless expeditions, and the pay of Deputies and Senators weighed heavily on the revenue. Agriculture was left to take care of itself. The national lands were allowed to remain unproductive. No public works were undertaken. Roads, drainage, mines, manufactures, one and all were neglected. When the King's hands were forced, and a representative form of Government was established, place-hunting, party intrigues, and corruption in various shapes became the order of the day. Your Lordships need hardly be told that the foreign policy of Greece corresponded to this state of things at home. International Law commanded no respect. Hostility to the Turkish Empire was a constant principle of action. The interest of foreign loans was paid irregularly, or not at all. The employment of foreign capital, so much needed in Greece, became an impossibility. Such were the results of the Grande Idée and its ally, Brigandage, under the protection, though certainly not with the approval, of the Protecting Powers.

Everyone knows that Greece owed its existence as a separate kingdom to the united efforts of England, France, and Russia, who took the new State into their protection, and who continue even now to be the acknowledged guardians of its independence. The Greeks are indebted to them not only for national existence, but also for the extent of territory they possess, the security they enjoy, and even for a portion of their annual expenditure. More than 40 years have elapsed since the three Protecting Powers agreed, by a formal Convention, to interfere between the Sultan and his insurgent Christian subjects. Be assured, my Lords, that their motives for this alliance were pure and laudable. Humanity called upon them to put limits to a struggle which threatened the utter destruction of the weaker party. A wise policy suggested their joint interference, even for the interests of Turkey. A danger, which hung over the peace of Europe, could only be averted by their united efforts. The trade of the Levant stood greatly in need of shelter from the disturbances of war and the assaults of piracy. Your Lordships may remember that the settlement, which was proposed at first in a friendly form and on moderate terms, assumed in the end a coercive character and a more extended range. The battle of Navarino, the withdrawal of the Ambassadors and Consuls from Turkey, the declaration of war by Russia, and the appearance of a French army in the Morea overcame, as well they might, the objections of the Porte. Turkey was forced into compliance, and left without defence from the annoyances of a petty but vexatious neighbour. Greece was established at the expense of Turkey and guaranteed, in effect even to misconduct, by the Allied Powers. The consequences, which were to be expected, soon became apparent. The Porte, in its intercourse with the Greek Government, was frequently treated with insult and provocation; its complaints were met with chicanery; its efforts to establish a better understanding with its former subjects were generally evaded; its provinces bordering on Greece were disquieted, and sometimes even assailed; and, finally, when the Cretan insurrection broke out, the Greeks did everything short of open war to assist the insurgents and prevent an amicable arrangement. The Allies themselves, my Lords, had much to endure. Their counsels were disregarded, the interest of their loans unpaid, their protection abused, their very names brought into discredit. Twice was England obliged to send a squadron to the Piræus in order to obtain redress. Such was the conduct of Greece during the Crimean War that it became necessary for French and English troops to occupy a part of Attica. The lawless operations of Greece respecting Crete threatened to re-open the Eastern Question, and a Conference of European Powers could alone extinguish the nascent flames.

These circumstances are more than sufficient to show that the Protecting Powers have other duties to perform as well as that of guarding the independence and territory of Greece. Turkey is entitled to require that their protection should not be used to shelter the Greeks, and secure their impunity, when they violate the Law of Nations, and stir and throw fresh fuel on the fire which consumes her Empire. Europe, also, has reason to expect that the principal members of her family should not allow their benevolence to be turned into an instrument of general alarm, embarrassment, and injustice. Your Lordships will perceive that, at least in this instance, the existence of a duty carries with it a distinct right of action. The Protecting Powers, when they gave their guaranty to Greece could only have meant to defend the territorial independence of that State against any unjust and unprovoked encroachment. It is nothing less than monstrous to suppose that Greece could ever be at liberty to assail or injure other countries, without provocation on their part, and with an exemption from consequences on her own supplied by the power of her Protectors. It is evident that, in every view of justice, the latter have no alternative but that of either leaving their ward to the responsibilities of international usage, or enforcing the necessary restraints by their own authority. If they were to decide on withdrawing their protection entirely from Greece, they would only exercise a legitimate discretion. The conduct of Greece has been such as fully to justify a decision to that effect, and even in making it the Allies would have to put up with some disadvantages, and to incur expenses fairly attributable to the same cause. In order to act with consistency, they would be obliged to withdraw their diplomatic representatives from Athens, and the apprehension of increased disorder in the waters of Greece, as well as in Greece itself, would probably require an increase of their naval forces in that region. But if they saw reason to prefer the severer branch of the alternative, their interference would not of necessity take an unfriendly form, and they might abstain from acting otherwise so long as the requisite efficiency of their measures would permit. Supposing even that their method of proceeding should, from necessity, become decidedly imperative, it cannot be doubted that their ultimate purpose would, nevertheless, continue to have a friendly and benevolent character. Your Lordships may presume that the three Powers would, of course, invest their agreement, as at first, with the formality of a regular Convention. If the Greeks themselves should consent to be parties to it, so much the better; at all events, it would probably be thought desirable to make them the offer.

Greece is by no means incapable of much progressive improvement; but her misfortune is, that the elements of progress have been thrown systematically into the shade. The business of a friendly Power, when interfering authoritatively, would be to bring those elements into life, and to employ them in the right direction. Proprietors, farmers, and labourers would surely, for the most part, hail with joy the suppression of a system which casts a gloom over their natural pursuits, and lays them open to frequent alarms, to occasional pillage, and to a constant sense of insecurity. Among the more educated classes, who figure in public life and are candidates for office either at the seat of Government or in the provinces, there must be many individuals susceptible of moral improvement, and capable of appreciating its advantages in the conduct of public affairs. But they have need of example, support, and encouragement, the inspirations of which must come for a time from without, and suggest, if not prescribe, to those in authority ideas of steadiness, impartiality, and moral principle. The youthful King has recently displayed such noble and generous qualities that the Allies might reasonably look to his concurrence for introducing a better state of things among his subjects, with due consideration for the future independence and welfare of the country. England, entitled by her position as chief mourner in the late calamity, would naturally take the lead, and I know not why she should mistrust the sympathies of France and Russia, her associates in the Protection. France, on former occasions, has acted with much generosity and perfect good-faith. Russia, though liable, in some respects, to being swayed by special views, would hardly like to abandon the field to the two Western Powers, acting conjointly and apart from her. Italy having had its share in the late calamity cannot but take an interest in our remedial measures. From Austria and Prussia, we could only desire a moral countenance, and that would hardly be refused.

With respect to the mode of proceeding, and the means of giving it effect, your Lordships are aware that they lie entirely in the domain of Government. It would be mere presumption for me to do more than shadow out the most obvious suggestions. The presence of a naval force is the first to occur. It need not be large. As a similar occupation to that which took place at the Piræus during the Crimean War might become necessary, the Powers would, no doubt, provide in time for such a contingency. To insure what may be termed indispensable—namely, a firm adherence to certain principles of government on the part of the Ministry, the Protecting Powers would probably require the admission of a foreign element into its counsels. Portugal affords a precedent for this expedient. During our Peninsular campaigns the British Ambassador for the time being was received as a member of the administration at Lisbon. The permanent suppression of Brigandage would naturally head the list of reforms. Roads, military stations, movable detachments of the army, indispensable for that purpose, would require the application of considerable funds. Might it not be worth while for the Allies to further these operations by a moderate aid in money? Would it not also be desirable to make the Turkish Government a party to the scheme, in so far as measures of police and military force are concerned? Interference of this kind, however friendly in manner and intention, would, no doubt, jar upon the national feeling in Greece; and for this reason, to say nothing of other considerations, it would be well to limit its duration. Much might be effected in five or ten years, and nothing short of absolute necessity should be allowed to extend the provisional state beyond that term. I venture to think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would meet his share of the expense without alarm or difficulty. In short, there is little doubt that the trouble would be greater than the cost under any presumable circumstances.

My Lords, I have strained your indulgence more than I intended in the outset; but I hope your Lordships will excuse me if I add a few more words—a very few—before I sit down. I feel that although I have tried to preserve a tone and spirit of moderation, I have, in substance, arraigned a Government; I have brought the Government of Greece before the bar of public opinion. This, my Lords, is no light matter; and Greece being the country concerned, it has cost me much to perform so painful a duty. It is, indeed, a duty to me, because I took so large a part in those transactions which led to the establishment of Hellenic independence. The discharge of that duty is painful to my feelings on more than one account. I have contracted a deep and abiding reverence for the literature of ancient Greece from the nature of my education and its place, the Royal and truly national seminary of Eton. I would not disguise the strong and cordial sympathies which I entertain for that people, degenerate as they may be, who claim descent from the most illustrious race of antiquity, who continue to breathe the pure atmosphere which inspired the best of that race, and who, after centuries of Turkish bondage, rose bravely from their degradation, and dashed their fetters at every risk against the teeth of their fanatical oppressors. Even to this hour I retain a large portion of my early affection for them; nor have I yet ceased to hope that they may in time justify the partiality of their friends, and, together with the names, retain some traces of their ancestral worth. I submit, in conclusion, to your Lordships, with becoming deference, that I have presented a fair title to your acceptance of the Motion which I have now the honour to propose. That Motion consists of four parts. The first two are simple matters of course, or nearly so, grounded on positive facts. The third I conceive to be more than warranted by official documents and other respectable authorities. With regard to the fourth, I feel assured that your Lordships will go with me in desiring to remove those causes which lie at the root of Hellenic Brigandage, with all its attendant miseries, and in recognizing those paramount obligations which virtually rest on the Protecting Powers. I have endeavoured to show the nature of the mischief and the duty of redressing it. I have, moreover, pointed to the means of accomplishing that object, and to the right of employing those means, and also to the hazardous consequences of neglecting an opportunity which ought never to recur. The final decision must, indeed, remain with Her Majesty's Government; but the proposed declaration of your Lordships' sentiments could hardly fail to strengthen their hands, and to give additional weight to those very urgent considerations which cannot be overlooked with prudence or consistency. I repeat that there is but one alternative: we must either interfere effectively, or withdraw altogether. I would ask whether the Greeks can possibly, can safely be left, as heretofore, to pursue their wild notions, dishonest and pernicious as they often are, under the shadow and shelter of the Protecting Powers?

In pressing this matter on your Lordships' attention, I have performed most reluctantly, and, I fear, most imperfectly, a delicate and onerous task. Supported by your Lordships, I may look with some degree of confidence to the eventual result; and if I should have the misfortune to come from a Division with scanty following, or even with none at all, I shall at least carry with me the humble consolation of having done my best, as an unworthy Member of this noble House, to extract enduring good from a passing calamity. I pretend to no exceptional merit for this endeavour. We must all have at heart to preserve our country from discreditable indifference, the peace of Europe from continual alarms, and Greece itself, which we have undertaken to protect, from the effects of a perverse and ruinous misgovernment. Allow me to add that, in thus appealing to your Lordships' judgment, I speak to the nation—nay, even to the world at large.

Moved, "That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty to assure Her Majesty that the House continues to regard with the deepest grief and horror the late atrocious murders perpetrated near Athens by a band of organized brigands on the persons of several of Her Majesty's subjects, including the Secretary of Her Majesty's Legation; to thank Her Majesty for the ample and early accounts thereof which it has pleased Her Majesty to communicate to the House; to submit whether there be not grounds for apprehending that the lives of the lamented victims were mainly sacrificed to parties acting more or less in secret understanding with the brigands; and to express an earnest hope that such further steps as Her Majesty may please to take with reference to these matters will be directed not only to the immediate suppression of brigandage in Greece but more especially to the removal of its real causes, be they what they may, in discharge of the obligations virtually contracted by Her Majesty and Her Majesty's Allies as the constituted protectors of that kingdom." — (The Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I venture to think it was hardly necessary for the noble Viscount to remind me of the conduct of the late Lord Clarendon, for I cannot but feel that I am standing on the very spot whence a few weeks ago he spoke to your Lordships in so straightforward, so sagacious, and so earnest a manner that I believe he commanded the assent of every Peer in this House. My Lords, there are two points in regard to this subject which are closely connected, but which, in my opinion, it is necessary to keep distinct from each other. First of all there is the question into which the noble Viscount has chiefly gone—namely, as to the general state of Greece and the duties of the Protecting Powers towards that country; and, secondly, there is the sad outrage which affected public opinion in this country and throughout Europe more deeply, I think, than any incident that has happened of late years. Now it would, in my judgment, be a very great mistake on the part of the Government and of the country to mix up these two questions. With regard to the first—the Government of Greece—it is clearly a question which must be considered in concert with the Protecting Powers, for it is one in which all the Powers of Europe must take a deep interest. With regard, however, to the second question—although we have the sympathy of all the countries of Europe, and the active co-operation of some, yet we are the parties primarily interested in it. I think it is not desirable to go into the first question at the present time, and therefore I shall only allude to one casual remark made by the noble Viscount, who, at one point of his speech, stated that he saw by the faces of the occupants of the Treasury Bench, that they had made up their minds to do nothing. I cannot conceive how that idea came into the noble Viscount's head, unless it was in consequence of my mentioning to him at that stage of his speech that I was sorry he had not arrived at more definite suggestions; and I am bound to say that afterwards four or five suggestions were made by the noble Viscount. With regard to the sad outrage so eloquently described by the noble Viscount there is very, very little for me to add to the speech made by the late Lord Clarendon. The principal facts are these—First of all the Greek Government yielded the opposition they originally made to the presence of legal agents on the part of Lord Clarendon—and I have every reason to believe that everyone must have been struck with the determination, sagacity, and ability which those agents have shown up to the present time. The other point is the conviction and execution of those wretched brigands who were actually concerned in the outrage. One has been reprieved for a time, possibly with a view to further the ends of justice in a larger way—the others have been executed. Lastly there remains that most important part of the inquiry—with regard to the possible participation of more highly educated and more powerful persons than those immediately connected with the brigands. As your Lordships will readily imagine, I can have taken very little part during the few days I have been in Office with regard to this affair. The only thing I have done is this — A rumour having reached us that the present Prime Minister of Greece was about to resign, I instructed Mr. Erskine that it was not our policy to interfere with regard to persons, but that we had a fixed determination that it was our right and our duty to insist upon the fullest and most complete inquiry that could be brought to bear upon the incidents I have already alluded to; and that, whatever Ministry or persons the King might think fit to maintain in Office or to summon to his counsels, who should be determined bond fide to meet that requirement on our part, that Ministry should receive the warmest sympathy on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I believe that language of an almost identical character has been used by the Italian and French Governments on this point. The Resolution of the noble Viscount (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) contains some expressions which it would have been desirable not to have introduced. I do not think it is a desirable thing for the House to address the Crown in several sentences of this kind unless there is a practical object to which such Address relates. Notice of this Motion was given without any previous communication with Lord Clarendon, who was of opinion that it was not a desirable Motion for the House to adopt. I entirely agree with him; but I am bound to say that the matter stands now in a different position to that which it occupied when the Notice was first placed on the Paper. I believe I may now say, without fear of contradiction, that your Lordships all had confidence in the experience and ability of the man who then presided over the Foreign Office. My position is a very different one, and your Lordships may, perhaps, think you would give me strength by conveying some preliminary reproof to me in order to keep me up to the duty I owe to the Crown and the country. Still, I think that Her Majesty's Government are acquainted with the feeling of the country, that they know what their duty is, and that they are sufficiently imbued with the views of Lord Clarendon on this matter. Here I must state that my lamented Friend's end was accelerated by the indignation he felt at this outrage, the sympathy he entertained for the victims who had fallen, and for the friends and families who mourn their loss; and that his appreciation of the just resentment of the country, and his anxiety to carry on the inquiry to a proper end and to demand whatever might be a just and due reparation, with a firmness and in a manner becoming a great nation like ours, was one cause which hastened the loss which we all so much deplore. Being under such inspiration, I trust that, although I may carry out his work most imperfectly, your Lordships will not, until I am found wanting, impose on me a Motion like the present, which, I think, would in some degree weaken instead of strengthening me in the eyes of Europe.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: As your Lordships were so good as to hear me speak on this subject at great length on a former occasion, I shall not travel over any of the ground which I went over then. At the same time, I can hardly allow the Motion which my noble Friend (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) has made on this important subject to be put without making a few remarks. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs very rightly divided the question into two parts—namely, that which concerns the massacre of the captives, and that which relates in a more abstract sense to the Motion which had been made by my noble Friend. As I have already said, I will not travel over the grounds of the previous discussion; and yet I do think it right to state on my own part that, after a careful study of all the Papers since issued, and after mastering as far as I could all the criticisms which have appeared elsewhere on the subject, I do unhesitatingly reaffirm the conclusions I expressed in the previous debate. These I have seen nothing to shake. Those who suffered at the hands of the brigands were betrayed by false assertions of the Greek Government as to their safety; and I do affirm still that the movement of the troops, in violation of the solemn promise and engagement of the Greek Government, to which promise was added the word of the English Minister, was the immediate cause of these murders. Nay I go further, and say again that there is not a word in the published correspondence which in any degree removes the suspicion attaching to the conduct and motives of the Greek Government. They still have to give every explanation which was demanded of them two months ago. More than that, I must express my dissent from my noble Friend when he stated his belief in unqualified terms, that whatever could be done had been done — my own estimate, taken from a somewhat different point of view, is that nothing has been done. There have been the executions of a few brigands or peasants, but they were a mere fraction of the band, which, according to the last details, had doubled or trebled in numbers since the murders, and are now extending themselves over other parts of Greece. It is true there was a trial, and I am glad to hear that the English agents employed at that trial were sagacious; but certainly if you study the details of the trial, as printed in the Parliamentary Paper, you will find no record of any action on the part of the British agents; while, as far as the Greek Judges and Court were concerned, I venture to express my opinion that the trial reads almost like a farce. There is nothing in these statements which in any degree removes the suspicions previously entertained—nothing that goes to the bottom of the matter and sifts out the guilty individuals. Lastly, the gentleman who showed more courage, decision, energy, and sagacity than any other was Mr. Noel, whose life at this moment can hardly be said to be quite secure. I have no interest in him whatever except what arises from the gratitude I feel for all that he did to save the lives of the prisoners, and I call with confidence on my noble Friend (Earl Granville) not to relax in any degree the pressure which Lord Clarendon thought it his duty to put upon the Greek Government. Let me now say a few words upon the second part of the Motion. It seems to me a misfortune that there should have been such a slight discussion on this subject. My noble Friend (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) represents very much of the enthusiasm which existed 40 years ago, when Greece was formed into a kingdom. We can recall the enthusiasm, the expenditure of money, and the sacrifice of our traditional policy which were readily offered to secure the emancipation of the Greek nation. I agree with him that the expenditure of money and the sacrifices we made, in accordance with the policy of that day, was not too great a price for the object in view; England was quite justified in the course she took upon that occasion. It is time now to reconsider the results of the policy then laid down. It would be impossible, without trespassing at too great a length, to draw anything like an adequate picture of the present state of Greece; but I should like to call attention to one or two main points connected with the financial and commercial condition of the country. At this moment Greece has no less than three National Debts. There is the debt guaranteed by the Protecting Powers at the time the independence of Greece was established, on account of which only one payment for interest has been made since 1843; there is the Bavarian Debt, contracted somewhere about the same time, and since 1837 no interest has been paid upon that; and the third debt is represented by the Greek Bonds. Upon these all payment has been suspended for some time, and arguments in favour of repudiation most questionable in character have been adduced to the utter destruction of Greek credit. In 1857, at the close of the Crimean War, a Commission was appointed by the Protecting Powers, really for the purpose of inquiring into the social condition of the country. That Commission made a most searching investigation, and I would ask my noble Friend to see whether, considering the grave matters now pending, it would not be desirable to lay some of the Papers arising out of that inquiry before the House. One or two of them have been printed, and through them we know that the Commission made some allegations to the effect that it was stated there was ample money in the Treasury to pay the interest on the debt, and that one year afterwards, as a matter of fact, the Greeks did find the money to pay the debt. Since then the country has been in a state of insolvency. All the recommendations of that Commission were most admirably adapted for the improvement of the country, but they have all been alike treated with neglect. As regards trade it languishes within the limits of Greece, and no less than two-thirds of the population are self-constituted exiles, and have sought refuge in those Turkish towns which have been the occasion of so much contempt on the part of the Greeks. Agriculture is very much what it was; and all speculative schemes have to contend against the vacillating policy of the Government. I remember the case of a French company who, two years ago, were working a silver mine. Every attempt was made to disgust and frighten them away, until at last they were suddenly called upon to pay an export duty, which amounted to 60 per cent of the total cost of production. Another company engaged in sinking for pitch had their wells filled up with stones, and could get no redress. Every sort of speculation is looked upon as injurious to the native population, and enterprise is therefore driven out of the country. It is perfectly certain that Brigandage is in a great degree the cause of this; it is true, also, that both the geography and history of the country have fostered Brigandage; but it must be remembered that Brigandage has grown of late in dimensions and atrocity. In former years it was supported by the Court, and certainly in the present day by the governing classes. It is undesirable to mention names; but I believe the account given of Brigandage by a very able French writer, though veiled under the form of romance, is strictly true as regards Greece. One special evil of Brigandage is this—that for many years past political persons and parties in Greece have made use of brigands as agents; as instruments to carry out their own selfish and personal ends. Even within the last few months the brigands have been employed in determining the municipal elections. The Minister looks to the Deputy, the Deputy looks to the local mayor, and the local mayor has recourse to the brigands to turn the votes and secure the election. The police are perfectly helpless in such a case, and the burden really falls on the peasant, who is exposed on one side to the oppression of the brigands, and on the other to the action of the troops when, in times of panic, they are sent in pursuit of the brigands. No class suffered more severely under the present state of things than the Greek peasant. I will now call the attention of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) to a subject which, from what I hear, calls for attention. I cannot say whether it be true or not; but it has been repeatedly stated of late by the Greek newspapers that torture is freely used by the police on the peasants to procure evidence. Two or three weeks since I saw an article in one of the chief papers on this subject, stating that, even with regard to these massacres, some witnesses who could have given unfavourable testimony were exposed to torture. These statements thus publicly made and practically remaining uncontradicted, form a subject of the gravest importance. I fear that matters have grown worse rather than better; and I am afraid that the Constitution given to it, of which my noble Friend (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) has spoken, made a great mistake in sweeping away the native aristocracy, which, although it may have been oppressive in some cases, at all events contained within it elements of security which any wise Government would have retained; the next Constitution, as your Lordships know, came to nothing; and the last has established in Greece what may be regarded as pure democracy. Greece is the very Utopia of democracies. She enjoys universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and every institution that the purest democrat can desire. Nevertheless, upon the authority of every person qualified to speak upon the subject, we are told that the inhabitants possess no constitutional liberty whatever. There are no roads to facilitate communication for purposes of trade; there is no justice which can be administered equally between persons of all classes; there is no coinage, there is no money in the Treasury—in fact, there is nothing which constitutes civilized government. There is one thing for which we must give the Greek nation credit, and that is their strong love for education. That is the one redeeming feature of the picture. But even education, instead of being a blessing to the country, takes the form of a vicious circle in that country, and for this reason—because most of the young men being educated to pass the necessary competitive examination before they could obtain public appointments, these public appointments, by being kept constantly before their eyes, become the first and sole object of every Greek mind; and the result is that the candidates, most of whom are brought up upon insufficient means, in the form of a hungry army of paupers, flock to Athens in order to gain there public places, which they obtain frequently by corrupt means. It has been said, upon the testimony of Sir Thomas Wyse, that the law of Greece is made for the strong and the rich, and not for the weak and the poor. It is perfectly true that the profession of the law is well represented in that country, for by a recent Return I see that the proportion of lawyers is one to every 3,000 of the population. Then, again, there is a superabundance of Government officials, the proportion being one to every 50 of the population. These are conclusions to which we are driven by the sheer logic of facts. The noble Lord who introduced the subject (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) alluded to the Ionian Islands. I am not going to say one word as to whether we were right or wrong in handing over those Islands to the Greek Government, but one thing is quite certain—namely, that we gave up those islands in a state of good government and good order. If your Lordships will turn to a Parliamentary Paper upon the subject, published about two years ago, you will find that such was the state of misgovernment that succeeded that transfer that the Judges had resigned in a body, the roads were overgrown with grass, from want of traffic occasioned by the stagnation of trade, and a general state of chaos prevailed. This is but a very faint picture of the internal affairs of Greece. If we look abroad as regards the country, we shall find the state of things described by the noble Lord. These unfortunate people are so absorbed in the hope of reviving the Byzantine Empire, that they starve the present for the purpose of endeavouring to secure the grandeur of the future. All attempts which have been made to convince them how utterly futile such a hope is have been ineffectual. The Emperor Nicholas, just before the commencement of the Crimean War, emphatically declared that he would not be a party to the restoration of the Byzantine Empire, but that declaration failed to open the eyes of the Greeks to the folly of keeping this object perpetually before them. The truth is, they are consumed by this idea, and they are misled by the mischievous notion that nothing they can do will induce Europe to check or to interfere with them; and it is this unfortunate idea which lies at the root of all the breaches of International Law that have been laid to their charge. It is the prevalence of this idea which accounts for the outbreaks which occurred in 1854, when we were compelled to send troops to the country to restrain them. The noble Viscount made various suggestions for our future conduct with respect to that country to which the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs has objected. Upon this point I will merely say that it is always easy to object to proposals of such a nature, because they are only put forward under exceptional circumstances; but the question before us now is, whether we are not contributing by our influence to support what I may say is the most immoral Government in Europe. It may be impossible that we should interfere in the manner suggested by the noble Viscount, and it is equally impossible that we should withdraw our Minister from Greece. If, however, we cannot enforce the obligations which that country owes to Europe, I say in Heaven's name let us no longer submit to the responsibility under which we now rest—let us withdraw from the Protectorate we are now supposed to exercise—let us wash our hands of the whole matter, let us be altogether free from any connection with these acts of infamy, which are continually occurring, and over which we can exercise no control. I know very well that it has been said that Her Majesty's Government ought not to take any action in the matter, lest by so doing they may precipitate what is termed "the Eastern Question." I think that we should have no fear of such a result. I do not think it would be to the credit of the Government of this country, if after all that has been said and done recently the matter were permitted to end here—some practical result ought to follow. I regret that no action has been taken with reference to this subject. I do not say that in reproach to those who now hold the reins of Office, because I believe that had Lord Clarendon's life been spared, his sympathies were so deeply interested, that he would not have permitted the matter to end without some practical result being achieved. I understand the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary to accept fully the responsibility that attaches to his official position, and to pledge himself and the Government that no efforts shall be wanting on their part to bring about a solution of this difficulty, honourable to this country, and to exact retribution for the blood of our countrymen, and for the indignities that have been passed upon this country.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, there is no one who at this crisis does not lament with deep seriousness the removal of the distinguished Minister who so lately directed our foreign affairs—whose knowledge upon these questions, and in particular of that now before your Lordships, was so wide and accurate: and I may say that there is a general feeling in the public mind that the Seals of the Foreign Office could not have been placed in better hands than in the hands of my noble Friend. To say nothing of generosity, taking into consideration the short time my noble Friend has been in Office, I do not think it would be wise to impose any restraint upon a Minister who is charged with such responsibilities, and who personally commands so much confidence in your Lordships' House and with the public. The subject all will admit is full of difficulties and intricacies, and I think it most undesirable that we should, at such a time, fetter the discretion of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. It seems to me most prudent to leave the noble Earl full power to use his own discretion in the matter, and complete liberty of action in reference to it. Now, as to the subject itself, it appears to me that my noble Friend (Earl Granville) has done all that could be expected at this moment in insisting, as he has insisted, that there should be a full, complete, and thorough inquiry in respect of those murders. For my part, having heard the speech made on a former occasion by the noble Earl who has just sat down (the Earl of Carnarvon), I must say I thought he made good his assertions, and that they are borne out by what was said on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I have recently read an anonymous pamphlet which professes to give the cause of these murders; but I think a more lame defence of the Greek Government and a more total failure to make good the allegations of the writer I have never known. It seems to me very clear that if the Greek Government had earnestly intended to save those English gentlemen from being the victims of the brigands, they should have pursued one of two courses—they should either have given orders that the soldiers were not to fire on the brigands, or they should have surrounded them with a force so considerable as would have made it impossible for them to escape. As there were, I believe, 13,000 troops at Athens then, the latter course would have been quite practicable. But it is obvious that the course taken by the Greek Government was quite as sure to bring about the murder of these English gentlemen as if the troops themselves had been directed to fire on the captives. This is amply proved. But there is something further to consider—namely, to what points my noble Friend should direct the attention of those who are to conduct the inquiry which is to take place. I remember that after the last debate I told my noble Friend Lord Clarendon that the charge which had been made against the Greek Government was a still more heavy charge than any that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) has attempted to make good. It was said then, and has since been repeated, that the charge made against the Greek Government is this—that while they said they could not think of violating the Constitution of Greece by taking the course they were asked to take in respect of those brigands who held the captives, so far from observing all the articles of that Constitution, they allowed brigands of the worst character—men who had committed murder over and over again, and who ought to have been regarded as infamous criminals—to go to Crete, when they ought either to have been executed or kept in prison. That charge has been made by a captain of the British Navy who is now in the service of Turkey (Captain Hobart), and it was repeated by my noble Friend. I cannot conceive a graver charge being made against a Government. I think, therefore, my noble Friend should direct the attention of those who are to conduct the inquiry to an investigation of this question—whether any persons who had been convicted in former years were allowed to swell the ranks of the insurgents in Crete. I can quite understand that a strong sympathy with the insurgents in Crete should be felt in Greece; but it is one thing that the Cretans should rise to vindicate their independence of Turkey, and quite another that brigands and felons should be sent to make war on Turkey in Crete on pretence of their being Cretan patriots. If the accusation to which I have just alluded be well founded, there can be no other conclusion drawn from the facts themselves than this—that the Greek Government are ready to violate the Constitution of their country when there is a question of raising an insurrection against a friendly State, but that they are not willing to infringe on the articles of that Constitution with the view of saving the lives of English gentlemen, captives in the hands of Greek brigands, even if their lives are only to be saved by that means. Captain Hobart alleges a number of cases in which criminals such as those to whom I have referred were allowed to go to Crete to join in the insurrection. Now, if this allegation be proved, after impartial inquiry, I cannot imagine how it would be consistent with the dignity of Her Majesty's Government to retain a representative of this country at the Court of Athens, and that in the end you would be obliged to withdraw from the guarantee you have given with respect to Greece. If the inquiry be full and impartial, and if it result in proof of that allegation, matters cannot remain as they are; but whether my noble Friend (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) ought to press his Motion is another question. As to the latter part of his Motion, I think it calls on Her Majesty's Government to do what it may not be in their power to accomplish. I remember talking to the representative of a foreign Power who had had some experience in Greece. He told me he admired the talent of the Greeks; but a people more low in point of morality he had never been acquainted with. It is, perhaps, asking too much of Her Majesty's Government to bring about a change in the morals of a whole people, and were my noble Friend to attempt it I think he would find it beyond his powers. Even if things be as bad in this regard as is stated, it should be remembered that a future time may witness a different state of things. It must be remembered that the Highlands of Scotland in 1690 and 1756 were very different from the Highlands of Scotland in the present day. I do not know that in 1690 any English Secretary of State could have been expected to remove the causes of the discontent which then existed in the Highlands. I wish to put it to my noble Friend whether, after the statement of my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, he really wishes to press his Motion. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) has pledged himself that an inquiry shall be instituted. The honour of the country is deeply involved in this matter; but I think it would be much better if my Friend the noble Viscount would leave the conduct of this business in the hands of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, reserving the right to avail himself of a future opportunity for adopting any course which circumstances may appear to him to render necessary.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, in reply to a request that he would not press his Motion to a Division, said, if he was to understand from the language held by his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary that he (Earl Granville) would not exclude from his consideration any mode of action which might be called for by the result of the inquiry, he would not be disposed to press his Motion. He trusted that if the result of inquiry should be such as to justify and call for the interference indicated in his Motion, that mode of action would not be excluded from the consideration of the Government. He should be glad to obtain an assurance on that point from the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary.

EARL GRANVILLE: What I stated was, that we meant to insist upon a full and complete inquiry into the circumstances of the particular outrage on the English prisoners; and that, with regard to the other and larger questions, we were prepared to consider them in concert with the European Powers.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, that, in consequence of that explanation, he should withdraw his Motion.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

NAVY—"INCONSTANT" AND "VOLAGE."

QUESTION.

MR. CORRY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will lay upon the Table of the House Copy of those parts of Sir Thomas Symonds's Reports which relate to the performance of Her Majesty's ships "Inconstant" and "Volage?"

MR. BAXTER: In answer, Sir, to the right hon. Gentleman, I have to state that Sir Thomas Symonds's Reports with reference to the Inconstant and Volage are included in the Reports on the Monarch and Captain, which we have already agreed to lay upon the Table. Let me remind the right hon. Gentleman, however, that if for the future it is to be understood that such Reports are always to be produced, officers will naturally write for the information not of the Admiralty, but of the House of Commons.

NAVY—RETIREMENT IN THE NAVY.

QUESTION.

MR. CORRY said, he would now beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that it is the intention of the first Lord of the Admiralty to consider such Officers as are qualified by age for optional retirement to be ineligible for appointments?

MR. BAXTER: In answer, Sir, to the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that, in consequence of the redundant state of the lists preventing a large number of eligible officers from obtaining employment in certain ranks, age has always been one of the considerations in selecting officers for appointments, and that there are, and always have been, manifest objections to giving employment to those who must soon after retire from the service, the country losing the benefit of their experience. Under the present system, however, the retirement is so much more liberal that full weight can be given to this consideration; but my right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), while acting on this principle, has no intention to make any fixed regulation precluding officers who might retire from age from being employed.

FOREIGN OFFICE BLUE BOOK.

QUESTION.

MR. MORRISON said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any arrangement can be made to satisfy the desire on the part of the public to obtain Copies of the Foreign Office Blue Book on the condition of the industrial classes in Foreign Countries?

MR. OTWAY said, in reply, that there was a great desire on the part of the Foreign Office to meet the wishes to which the hon. Member gave expression, with regard to the Blue Book in question. The matter stood in this way. After the distribution of the Reports on the industrial classes to the Houses of Parliament, between 60 and 70 copies were presented by the Foreign Office to the Chambers of Commerce and other institutions in the country. There were about 200 copies now left in the Foreign Office, and what was proposed to be done was to send this number of copies to Messrs. Hansard, to be sold at the usual Parliamentary price of 3s. a volume, and they could thus be placed within the reach of those institutions which desired to possess them.

ARMY—STAFF APPOINTMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. WHITE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War,

Whether any regulation is in force by which officers of the Army holding Staff Appointments are required to leave such offices after a service of five years; and whether there are any officers to whom such regulation has not been applied; and, if so, upon what principle such exemption is justified?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the 106th section of the Royal Warrant says—

“All Staff appointments, except those of Officers on our Personal Staff, of the Officer Commanding in Chief, and of Officers on his Personal Staff, and the Staff of our Garrisons, shall be held for five years only, unless by re-appointment under special circumstances.”

I believe that the only officers at the present time to whom this rule is applicable, and has not been applied, are the Adjutant General, who continues to discharge his duties until the arrival of his successor from Gibraltar, and the Deputy Adjutant General of Royal Artillery, who has been continued for a short time to complete the re-distribution of the Royal Artillery, rendered necessary by the reductions in India.

SILK SUPPLY ASSOCIATION.

QUESTION.

MR. CHADWICK said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he is aware that the Khedive of Egypt, on the suggestion of the Silk Supply Association, has determined to promote the production of Silk in Egypt on an extensive scale, and has appointed Mr. Ankatel to superintend an establishment for that purpose; and what steps have been taken by the Government of India to encourage and increase the production of Silk, thereby reviving an ancient industry over a large portion of India where the mulberry tree is indigenous, and affording employment for the people?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to the Question of my hon. Friend, I have to say that, on the formation of the Silk Supply Association in the spring of last year, the Secretary of State in Council forwarded the proceedings of the association and the correspondence with it to the Governor General and the Governors of Madras and Bombay. The Government of India replied, begging the Secretary of State—

“To inform the association that they fully appreciated the importance of the objects for which it had been established, and that they should always be happy to render all the aid in their power to promote the success of those objects.”

They then circulated a copy of the despatch from the Secretary of State and its enclosures to the several local Governments, and published the whole correspondence with the association in the official Gazette. The substance of this reply was sent to the association on the 14th of June. Neither the Madras Government nor that of Bombay has replied directly to the Duke of Argyll's despatch; but they appear to have taken steps to make known the objects of the association. I find various notices of silk cultivation in papers recently received from India. For example, in the proceedings of the Government of India for October, 1869, it appears that, on the recommendation of the First Assistant to the Resident at Hyderabad, the Governor General in Council sanctioned an outlay of £500 from the provincial revenues of Berar for an experiment in the cultivation of mulberry trees for the propagation of the silkworm, and something in the same direction is being done in Khandeish. I have every reason to believe that the authorities, both in this country and in India, are very anxious to promote the growth of the mulberry, and that, in common with all other valuable Indian products, silk will obtain more and more attention from the Government.

SPAIN—CHOICE OF A KING—PRINCE LEOPOLD OF HOHENZOLLERN.

QUESTIONS.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any foundation for the report which has appeared in certain Spanish journals, “that England has expressed herself favourable to the selection of a member of the House of Hohenzollern to fill the throne of Spain?”

MR. OTWAY: There is no foundation whatever for the report alluded to.

SIR WILLIAM HUTT said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government is aware that the Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern Sigmaringen has been accepted by the Government of Spain as a candidate for the throne of that country, and the Government of the King of Prussia has in any way signified its approval of such candidature; whether it be true, as publicly alleged, that the Government of the Emperor of the French has declared that the election by the Spanish people of the Prince Leopold as King of Spain would be regarded by it as an act inconsistent with the Peace of Europe; and, whether Her Majesty's Government do not consider it highly important to exert all the influence of this country with Foreign Powers to prevent any such disturbance of the European Peace?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it was on Tuesday evening last, I think, that the Government, to their no small surprise, received the intelligence on the subject to which my right hon. Friend has called attention. The intelligence we received was to the effect that Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern Sigmaringen had been accepted by the Government of Spain as a candidate for the throne of that country; and it was also to the effect that the Government of the Emperor of the French had declared that the accession of this Prince to the Spanish throne would not be tolerated by France, but would be regarded by them as a case admitting of and requiring a resort to extremities. The Government are not aware that the Government of the King of Prussia has committed itself or bound itself to any approval of such candidature. Finally, the Government have exercised, and will exercise, all the legitimate and friendly influence they may be supposed to possess—with a due regard to the dignity and self-respect of every Foreign Power—for the purpose of preventing an event so calamitous and so deplorable as that a great European conflagration and bloodshed should arise out of circumstances of the character referred to in the Question of my right hon. Friend.

WINCHESTER AND HARROW SCHOOLS. QUESTION.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he wished to ask Mr. Solicitor General, Why the Special Commissioners appointed under the Public Schools Act, 1868, having had the opportunity of reconsidering the statutes framed by them for determining and establishing the constitution of the new Governing Bodies of Winchester and Harrow Schools, with reference to the principles laid down in the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, have restricted the Governing Body of each of those Schools to members of the Church of England, although Winchester School was a pre-Reformation foundation, and in the case of Harrow School no such restriction as was now proposed has hitherto existed?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, in reply, that the two schools in question stood upon different grounds. Winchester was founded long before the Reformation by William of Wykeham, upon the strictest ecclesiastical principles, and for the bringing up of persons strictly devoted to the pursuit and study of religion; and from the passing of the Act of Uniformity to the present day it had always been considered that a Church of England character was distinctly impressed upon it. In the discussion which took place in this House it was understood on both sides that the case of Winchester was peculiar, and it was a conceded point that Winchester must be treated as a Church of England school. Somewhat different was the case of Harrow, founded by John Lyon, who in his lifetime issued a number of orders and regulations which had ever since been the governing statutes of the school, and had not been materially altered. These stipulated that the scholars should learn the catechism; that they should attend Divine service; that they should hear the Scriptures read and expounded; and that, at the expense of the founder, 30 sermons a year should be preached by the Master in the church, which implied that he must be a member of the Church of England; and it was expressly stated that on Sundays and holydays use should be made of the catechism by Nowell, one of the founders of the Reformation, a Principal of Brazenose, a Dean of St. Paul's, and a Canon of Windsor—a catechism which he drew up at the instigation of the two Archbishops, which had always been considered one of the symbolical books of the Church of England, which was approved by the Convocations of Canterbury and York, and which, by the 79th Canon of 1603, every Master was required to read on pain of suspension. Coupling these circumstances with the terms of the Act, it would seem that the Public School Commissioners had good grounds for exempting Harrow. Further, he had received letters from Dr. Butler, the present, and Dr. Vaughan, the late Head Master, confirming the conclusion as to the exclusively Church of England character of the school. In stating these facts, which he considered to be sufficient to justify the action of the Commissioners, he did not wish to separate himself from them, although he took no part in the decision to which they came.

REGENT'S PARK—ORNAMENTAL WATER.—QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of a Letter, dated 8th July instant, addressed to him, upon the offensive state of the ornamental water in the Regent's Park, by Dr. Whitmore, the Medical Officer of Health for the parish of St. Marylebone?

MR. AYRTON: Sir, my attention has been drawn by reports which have reached me to this subject, and I shall be happy to lay them on the Table of the House. It is beyond doubt that the state of the ornamental water in Regent's Park at the present time is very unsatisfactory, and it is believed that that result is owing to the fact that the water has been made shallow and the bottom of a uniform depth. At present the only mode of relief, having regard to the manner in which the work was carried out, is by increasing the depth of the water, and I have given directions that the depth should be increased accordingly. As to the permanent remedy for the evil, it will be necessary carefully to consider the mode in which the works were carried out two or three years ago, in order to ascertain what alterations will be required in order to secure the continuous purity of the water, and to prevent its getting again into its present condition.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK—THE SERPENTINE.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is prepared to take any steps for the effectual clearing of the mud in the Serpentine?

MR. AYRTON: Sir, the subject is being carefully considered by the persons the most competent to form a reliable opinion upon it, and I shall submit to the Government whatever conclusion they may arrive at.

The Solicitor General

INSPECTORS OF TAXES.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why Inspectors of Taxes, over fifty-five years of age, who retired in March, 1869, had the full increase of ten years added to their actual length of service as the basis of computation for their superannuation pension; and for what reasons in the present year Inspectors of Taxes who have been reduced in consequence of the diminution of the establishment are to have a certain sum deducted from their retiring allowance for every year in excess of the age of fifty-five, and which Order or Regulation was not acted on in the case of those who retired in 1869?

MR. STANSFELD said, in reply, that the best answer he could give would be to state the regulations under which Inspectors of Taxes and other Government employés were compensated upon the abolition of offices. A certain number of years were added to the actual length of service for the purpose of computing the pensions—for example, if a man had served 20 years, under ordinary circumstances he would be entitled to have 10 years added, and to have his pension calculated as if he had served 30 years. Such an addition, however, would be unreasonable if it would carry a man beyond the time of life at which he could reasonably have been expected to remain in the service, and in 1864 a Treasury Minute was issued modifying the regulations in this respect. When the additional number of years would carry a man beyond the age of 60 the Treasury exercised a discretion as to the additional number of years they would allow; and, speaking generally, the rule they adopted was not to make an addition which would carry a man beyond the age of 65. If it happened that in 1869 any Inspector, on the abolition of his office, had been pensioned on a more liberal scale, he presumed that the rule had been overlooked.

POST OFFICE—LETTER POSTAGE. QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS said, he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, Whether he has contracted with the West India and Pacific Steam Ship Company, and with the Liverpool, Brazil, and River

Plate Steam Navigation Company, to pay them two shillings and sixpence for the carriage of letters; and in that case what rate of postage is charged by the Post Office to the public for letters sent by these ships, and what amount of loss (if any) the Post Office sustains by the Contracts; and, whether he has contracted with the North German Lloyd Company to carry letters from Southampton to New York at three pence per ounce, instead of one shilling per ounce, which had previously been paid for the same service; and if he will state what rate of postage was charged to the public under the previous Contract, and what rate is charged under the reduced Contract?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that the Government had entered into a contract with the West India and Pacific Steam Ship Company for the conveyance of letters to the West Indies, and with the River Plate Steam Ship Navigation Company for letters to the Brazils; and the charge agreed upon was that stated by the hon. Member—namely, 2s. 6d. per ounce; the charge to the public for the conveyance of such letters was 1s. per half-ounce. No loss was sustained by the Post Office on account of the contract. It was also true that the North German Lloyd's Company had contracted to carry letters at 3d. per ounce from Southampton to New York, instead of at 1s. per ounce, which was the former charge. The rate of charge had been reduced from 6d. per half-ounce to 3d. per half-ounce.

POST OFFICE — COUNTRY POST-MASTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOWARD said, he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, If it is correct that while subordinate officers in Country Post Offices are allowed regular holydays, during which substitutes are provided by the Department, Country Postmasters, many of whom commence work at 5.30 a.m., and whose duties did not terminate till 10.30 p.m., are not allowed either regular holydays or substitutes during absence; and, if so, whether there is any good reason for continuing such a distinction; whether a list of places, both at home and abroad, to which the public can telegraph is in course of preparation; and, if so, how soon it will be published; and whether he will order a List of Foreign Rates for Telegrams to be published in the Postal Guides, or give to the public the information in some other way?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, it was quite true that arrangements were made for allowing subordinate officers in the country post offices to have regular holydays; and it was also true that when the whole time of a Postmaster was occupied by his official duties arrangements were made for allowing him also to have regular holydays. But in the country the office of Postmaster was frequently held by persons who attended for the greater part of their time to other business, and it was not considered necessary in that case to arrange for special holydays, though no objection was ever made to the temporary absence of the Postmasters, if they found substitutes for the proper performance of their duties. In regard to the second Question of the hon. Member, such a list had been prepared and could be seen at the Post Office; but at present—when additions were being made to it almost every day—it was not considered desirable to make it public.

INDIA—MEDICAL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether an examination of candidates for the medical service in India will take place in the spring of 1871, as it is understood an examination will not take place in the present Autumn; and, whether any Copies of the Financial Statistics of India from the end of the last century, and published by the Governor of India, could be made available to those Members of the House of Commons who take an interest in the finances of India on application for Copies at the India Office?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to my hon. and gallant Friend I regret to say that I am unable to answer his first Question. It is quite possible that there may not be an examination next spring, as it is understood that the medical service is rather overmanned at present. We have, however, written to India asking for precise information as to immediate requirements, and I can state nothing definite till we have an answer. In reply to his second Question, I regret to say that no copies of the documents to which he alludes have up to this time reached the India Office.

METROPOLIS — CARRIAGE - ROAD THROUGH ST. JAMES'S PARK.

QUESTION.

Mr. CADOGAN said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, in accordance with his statement of the 6th May last, that carriages would be allowed to drive from the end of James Street through the end of St. James's Park and out by Storey's Gate, he is prepared to sanction the opening of this thoroughfare, or whether the intention of so doing has been abandoned; and, if so, upon what grounds?

Mr. AYRTON said, in reply, that what he had stated on a former occasion was that he could not entertain any proposition to make a permanent thoroughfare through St. James's Park; but as it was in contemplation to stop up a part of King Street, and obstructions might in consequence arise to the passage of hon. Members through Parliament Street, he proposed the formation of a temporary road through St. James's Park. Since then, however, circumstances had changed, for he could not now say when the way through King Street would be stopped up, and he did not think that it was likely to be stopped during the present Session. At the same time he was informed that the Thames Embankment Road would be opened for carriage traffic on Wednesday, and then the Government, without speculating on the subject, would have the opportunity of observing the effect of that road in relieving the traffic through Parliament Street. Under these circumstances, it was not desirable that the existing arrangements with respect to St. James's Park should be interfered with, unless it should be found to be absolutely necessary.

METROPOLIS—SUBWAY AT WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.—QUESTION.

Mr. EDWARDS said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, What arrangements have been made or are proposed to be made with reference to the Subway under the Westminster Bridge approach, after the carriage road on the Embankment is opened to the public, as proposed on Wednesday next.

Mr. Grant Duff

Mr. AYRTON said, in reply, that after the proposal had been made for constructing a subway under the approach to Westminster Bridge, but before it had been constructed, the Office of Works had sold all the land on the other side of Westminster Bridge that could have given access to the subway, reserving only the right of the Crown to go under that subway to the Metropolitan railway station. When he found that that was the case, and that Mr. Barry had been constructing the subway under Westminster Bridge, he requested that gentleman to communicate with the Metropolitan Board of Works and the railway company for the purpose of carrying out what he believed was the intention of the House in sanctioning the subway—namely, that hon. Members should be able to go from the corner of Cannon Row to the mouth of the subway, and thence either to the House, or under the new Embankment to the landing place for steamers. Mr. Barry said that he was unable to make the arrangement he had suggested. It therefore seemed to him that he should get on better if he dispensed with that gentleman's further services. Accordingly he had effected an arrangement with the Metropolitan Board of Works, by which the latter undertook, at its own expense, to open a communication with the steamboat pier by means of a curve, which would not interfere with the land which had been sold. This communication would be open in a few days, and he was very thankful for having thus got out of the difficulty.

PARLIAMENT—SCOTCH AND IRISH PEERS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

QUESTION.

Mr. STAPLETON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government will be prepared before the close of the next Session to propose to either House of Parliament a plan for securing a better representation of the Scotch and Irish Peers in the House of Lords.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Sir, I hope that my hon. Friend will excuse me if I say that at the present moment, viewing the condition of Public Business and our own engagements, I can make no announcement respecting the representation of Scotch and Irish Peers in the House of Lords. At the same time I must express the opinion to my hon. Friend that the present rules for that representation are unsatisfactory and that the subject is one which well deserves the attention of Parliament.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (re-committed)

BILL—[BILL 187.]

(Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 65 (Attendance of child at school).

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had an Amendment to propose, which would raise the question of compulsory education on a complete issue, which he thought it would be convenient for the Committee to decide once for all. His Amendment was, in page 24, line 21, to leave out all after "by laws" to the end of the clause, the effect of which would be to omit all reference to compulsory attendance of children in the schools. He would not go over the arguments against compulsory attendance, which had been so ably expressed on Friday by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), and others, to which no answer had been given, except that given by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council—namely, that no answer was required. For examples of compulsory education they were told to look to the European Continent and to America. But there could be no proper comparison between the inhabitants of these islands and the subjects of either despotic or democratic States. The circumstances were widely different, and therefore if it could be proved that compulsion was perfectly successful in these countries, still his argument would be untouched, because the experiment tried on people brought up under the tyranny of the few, or the still worse tyranny of the many, afforded no argument from which they could reason to a people accustomed to freedom and independence. They might as well say that, because the conscription, which was compulsory enlistment, was successful, and ensured vast levies of troops in France, in Prussia, and in America, therefore it would be successful in England, whereas there was not a single Member in that House who did not know that any attempt to put in force such a system here would drive the patient and long-suffering inhabitants of these islands into open insurrection. And, moreover, he could not bring himself to entertain so low an opinion of his fellow-countrymen as for one moment to believe that they would ever submit to be dragooned into knowledge, or to have the alphabet crammed down their throats by a policeman's truncheon. Such parallels then could not be drawn. But it appeared from the speech of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) that, instead of the system succeeding on the Continent, it was an acknowledged failure. The hon. Member, indeed, gave them several reasons why it was a failure; but the failure was acknowledged. With these failures staring them in the face, he thought the House would hesitate before they took a step so opposed to the feelings of the people of this country. For a parallel to this legislation they must look a long way back indeed. They on his side of the House were often charged with pursuing a reactionary policy; but for a parallel to this policy of the Government they must look back for three centuries, when the Legislature imposed penalties for non-attendance at religious worship. That was now looked upon as the folly of a past age; he hoped the House would not sanction this attempt to go back upon it. The hon. Member for Sheffield, indeed, said that this was not a question of police or of magistrates—all was to be done by a pacific action and the genial influence of the school Boards. But were these Boards to have the power of levying fines and committing to gaol Her Majesty's subjects? ["No!"] He presumed the whole proceeding would take place according to the ordinary operation of law. Now, what was to take place if a fine were imposed and not paid? The only alternative was imprisonment. Here was a grand scheme for the elevation of the condition of the people commencing by sending the father to gaol, and his wife and family to the workhouse. But the advocates of compulsion always avoided that issue; they said that if the Act were passed there would never be occasion to put it in force. He ventured to say that nothing could be more dangerous than legislation of such an abortive character. Unpopular legislation provoked hatred; but abortive legislation engendered contempt. They had seen too many of their laws already turned into ridicule on account of their being due to impulsive legislation. This legislation was, as he believed, opposed to all the instincts and traditions of the people—it was introducing a tyrannical interference with domestic life, which the people of this country would be very slow to approve. It involved a substitution of State in lieu of domestic control. It was, as he ventured to say on Friday, specially directed against one class in the community. [“No, no!”] Why, what but one class in society would be affected by it? They did not mean to say that it was directed against the children of the upper classes; if so, he fancied there would be more heard in opposition to it; and further, it was legislation which, if adopted, they would never dare to enforce. He especially objected to permissive compulsion as an abdication of legislative responsibility; it was an attempt to throw the odium of compulsion upon the wealthy inhabitants of the district, instead of laying it upon the shoulders of those who alone ought to be responsible—namely, the Imperial Parliament. He therefore begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 24, line 21, to leave out from the word “by laws” to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. James Lowther.)

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he had not hitherto taken part in this discussion, because he was reluctant to occupy the time of the House. But the question before the Committee was one which so deeply affected the constituency with which he was connected (Dewsbury), and on which they had formed so strong an opinion, that he felt bound to say a few words. The hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) had referred to certain analogies. He disliked tyranny as much as the hon. Member did, whether it appeared in the shape of a despotic Government or a democracy; but he could not see any analogy between these forms of Government and the measure before them, any more than there was in his other analogy between compulsory attendance at school and that obsolete law which compelled persons to attend some parish church. It would be a waste of time to attempt to show that there was a wide difference between coercing the consciences of men on matters of religion and compelling them to train their children as good citizens. He supported the principle of compulsion, and he only regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had not seen it his duty to carry it further, for it seemed to him to be the necessary corollary of such a Bill as the present. He was willing to admit that there was no other ground for this compulsion than that required by the necessities of good government. It was only when parents failed in the duty which they owed both to their children and to the State, to train them up as good citizens, that the State was justified in stepping in and seeing that the duty was done. The principle was not a new one; for the law empowered the Court of Chancery to interfere in the case of orphans where property was concerned; and instances had been known of the State interfering and claiming children from parents who were not of orthodox religious opinions. But the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council dealt tenderly with compulsion; he was reluctant to approach it because of a mistaken idea that the feelings of the working classes were against it. With regard to the ratepayers, out of whose pockets the money for the schools would come, it was clearly their interest to see that when the schools were there the young people should be educated in them and brought up as good citizens and honest men, instead of being left to roam the streets and become criminals or paupers. Compulsory attendance, therefore, was the only guarantee which the taxpayers or the ratepayers could have that the taxes which were imposed or the rates which were levied for the support of the schools, were properly and efficiently applied. With regard to the working classes, as far as his experience went, he believed that, if they were polled, they would almost to a man be in favour of compulsion. [“No, no!”] He said as far as his experience went; and his intercourse with the working classes was not limited, for he had attended meetings where there were thousands of working men assembled; and when he was on his canvass the question was always asked whether he was in favour of compulsory education, and he found there was but one opinion upon the subject. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not gone further in the way of compulsion, because he regarded it as the duty of the State to enforce its own laws, not to cast it upon the shoulders of others to do so. Whether he would support the right hon. Gentleman he could not at that moment determine; but, most probably he would support him, because he regarded this as an experiment, and, as the right hon. Gentleman said, he believed that at the end of two years they would all be of one mind on the subject.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Serjeant Simon) contradicted himself. If the parents of the children were so unanimous in favour of the Bill, what was the use of compulsory clauses? The hon. and learned Gentleman called upon Parliament to compel the very parties whom he asserted to be willing and eager, and to need no compulsion. The hon. Gentleman argued as if the Government were stopping short and were not carrying out an essential principle of the Bill. But the question was this—was compulsion necessary for the whole body of the poorer classes for whom the Bill was intended? He held that it was not. Compulsory clauses if wanted at all were wanted only for a small portion—namely, for the most neglected children, and it was absolutely stigmatizing the working classes to push this obnoxious compulsory principle beyond what was needed, and assert it for the whole population. Now, so much did the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) feel that this was the case that it seemed as if the compulsory clause was so worded that it might have no effect. There was one plain idea which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have been possessed with, and that was the creation of school Boards in every district, into which he expected the denominational schools would gradually merge; and accordingly the clauses relating to that subject were clear and complete. But on other points clauses seemed put up as mere shams for discussion. The right hon. Gentleman did not appear to think they would ever come into force, so that he need not care how they were drawn; he had tried this plan with the religious clauses—

though he had found out his mistake by this time—and now he was trying it with compulsion. If this clause was to be carried out, how was it to be done? The right hon. Gentleman said that the school Boards would see that the children should attend; but it did not appear that they had any means for doing so until in a subsequent part of the Bill it secured that attendance was to be enforced by the magistrates. Did the right hon. Gentleman intend to give the school Boards not only in the larger towns, but in the smaller towns of the country magisterial powers? If not, by what means were these Boards to lay hold of the children? How were they to come in contact with the parents, and to bring the law to bear upon them? There was no power or provision in the clause for doing all that. If the clause could somehow come into play, still it would only be with regard to a very small portion of the children of towns—those, namely, who were found wandering in the streets without visible means of occupation, and who were, indeed, the most neglected of children. But for those children there was already provision in the existing law; the Industrial Schools Act with very slight alterations might be made to provide for all the class of children for whom this most obnoxious clause was ever, by any possibility, applicable. It was a clause which would throw unpopularity over the whole of the Bill, and discredit the great system of national education which it was sought to bring into operation. The best way to induce the poorer classes to send their children to school was to make it clear to them that to send them there was for their advantage. The increasing demand for skilled labour was doing that, and for the more degraded class running loose about the streets there were already means for compulsion. He admitted that the Industrial Schools Act did not provide for the day education of those children whose parents or guardians were still living; but it would need but slight alteration to make it cover those cases. Such schools were frequently used as day schools, and were meant to be kept distinct from reformatories. Under all the circumstances he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the Committee a little more information as to how the clause was to act—that is, in what way different from the Industrial Schools

Act, and whether school Boards were to lay hold of children in the streets, and carry them off to school daily by a police of their own.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the Committee would allow him to appeal to them as to the real necessity which existed that the Bill should be proceeded with without any unnecessary waste of time. They had now arrived at a period of the Session when it was not desirable that the arguments which had been advanced on a point which had already been decided should be repeated. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) would, under those circumstances, he felt sure, excuse him if he did not enter on the present occasion into the particular question which he had raised. The House had declared, by two large majorities, that compulsion should not be made universal throughout the country. But then it was urged by the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) that there should be no compulsion at all, while the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) who was in favour of compulsion, was of opinion that it would be better to have none than to introduce compulsory clauses into the Bill which were merely permissive, and which were not to be universal in their application. Well, without going over ground which he had already trodden he would simply observe that the principle of compulsion had been for some time acknowledged, and so far as its interference with the liberty of the subject was concerned, there could be little difference between direct and indirect compulsion. Then arose the question whether it was desirable to have permissive compulsion, and that compulsion applied only in certain districts, or whether it would be preferable to do without it altogether. The hon. Member for York contended that compulsion in any shape was contrary to public opinion and unpopular. But then it should be borne in mind that the clause under discussion contemplated that it should only be put in force where the public opinion of a district happened to pronounce itself in its favour through the Town Council, which was amenable to the public voice, or through the rate-payers themselves. The objection that it would make the measure unpopular did not, therefore, apply to the clause as it at present stood. Then came the objection that the principle was to be carried out under the Bill in a very partial manner. But he could only repeat what he said on Friday—that one of the great advantages of the clause was that the experiment which would thus be tried would serve as an important guide in dealing with the question in the future. It would enable the Government to form a conclusion as to how compulsion was carried into effect by persons who took a great interest in the matter, and who were practically acquainted with all the circumstances and facts of the case. Hon. Members must decide for themselves whether they would or would not like the experiment to be tried; the Government would be very much guided by the decision of the Committee, and if the proposal were not sanctioned there that would be sufficient evidence of its unpopularity, and it would then be wiser for the Government not to press the clause. For his own part he should be glad to see the clause passed very much as it stood. He could assure the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles Adderley) that the clause had not been drawn carelessly, for there was not a single clause in the Bill which had been the subject of more care and attention on the part of the Government. When they reached the details of the clause he would be able to give reasons for every line contained in it. As to the objection that there would be no mode of enforcing the clause, it would be found, by reference to the words at the end of the page, that provision was made in the usual way for the by-laws being summarily carried out by the magistrates.

MR. HERMON said, he was of opinion that if compulsion was right and expedient it ought to be applied to the higher and middle as well as to the lower classes. There were many self-taught artisans who were better up in Greek, and even Hebrew, than hon. Members who were educated at the Universities. He did not like the principle of direct compulsion, and he felt convinced that the Government did not like it either. He believed it would tend to fill the gaols rather than the schools. According to the Bill, if their children failed to attend school, "every" parent would be fined—meaning thereby both the father and the mother, and if the fine were not paid they must go to gaol. Although, however, he objected to direct compulsion, he could say that the system of indirect compulsion had worked well in the manufacturing districts, and he would like to see it applied to the agricultural districts also.

Mr. JACOB BRIGHT said, he should consider it a misfortune if the plan of the Government were not adopted by the House. As to the objection of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) that direct compulsion would cause many people to go to gaol, he believed that, with a general system of compulsory education, fewer persons would be in gaol than now. A magistrate of Manchester wrote to him that he had before him the other day four prisoners charged with breaking into a warehouse. Their ages were 13, 10, 9, and 9, and though mere children, they were "known thieves." As to the alleged unpopularity of compulsory education, the most popular candidate at the last election for Manchester was the late Mr. Ernest Jones, who made this one of the principal questions at every meeting he attended; and if it had not been for the minority clause, that gentleman would probably have been elected. In Manchester there was a strong desire for compulsion. He thought, however, that a general law would be tried at present under applied where public opinion would be applied where compulsion was not ripe, discussed or heard of. It had never been permissive compulsion. On the other hand, applied where a decision would only be in the majority of the work-classes would, therefore, be in its favour; and it tried with success, in those instances be for Carlisle success. The hon. Member probably (Mr. E. Potter) said that principle 40 places would adopt the only 20 of compulsory education. If place adopted places, or five, or if even one of the adopted it, the precedent would be the greatest service. Such places was pioneer the way, would show it enable practicable, and would do much to law. Parliament to pass a general ability. He had great admiration for the (Mr. Es of the hon. Member for Brighton the Fawcett); but if there were not in than House men of more practical minds fore this, a long time would elapse before they could hope for measures of Mal legislation.

hon. Mr. FAWCETT said, he thanked the Member for that compliment, but experience showed that men who were practicable one day became extremely impracticable another day, and that almost great measure had been advocated at one stage of its existence by men who were called impracticable. The question of general direct compulsion having been decided—for the present Session, at all events, last Friday, the question now before the Committee was whether it would be better to have permissive compulsion, or no compulsion at all. Some hon. Members opposed this part of the Bill because they objected to all compulsion. He opposed the clause because permissive compulsion would cause the experiment to be tried in so unfavourable a manner that it would be difficult to apply a system of general compulsion for a great number of years. So far from affording useful guidance to Parliament, he believed that permissive compulsion would furnish no guidance at all, and would afford no test of the feeling of the country in favour of compulsion. The clause contained no machinery for applying compulsion, yet there was no case in which more delicate, complicated, and difficult machinery was required; and the local authorities received no help from the Legislature in working the system, but were allowed to bungle and confuse it as they pleased. Try the question by this test. With all their shortcomings, the Factory Acts had worked well; but, in all probability, if the clauses in those Acts had been permissive, they would have produced no effect at all. All permissive legislation in this country had proved a disastrous failure; and if the Factory Acts had failed through being permissive there would have been a prejudice against the extension of those Acts to other branches of industry. A county Member of that House, who had set up a school in his own parish, said to him that, though he had been long convinced that nothing could be done without compulsion, he would not vote for permissive compulsion; because it was one thing to go to people and say their children should be sent to school because the Imperial Parliament had laid it down as a matter of State policy, and quite another to worry and harry them with all sorts of vexatious restrictions, the grievance being intensified a hundred-fold by the fact that, if they lived perhaps 100 yards off, outside the parish, they would not be subject to compulsion. He wished to ask the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) whether in the two boroughs with which he was acquainted—Sheffield and Nottingham—permissive legislation had had any effect? He (Mr. Fawcett) alleged that it had not. Three years ago the Workshops Act was passed, but the local authorities had been paralyzed in their intention to put the law in operation by the knowledge that just outside those boroughs lived thousands of working men who would not be subject to the regulations. Englishmen abhorred nothing more than exceptional legislation; and the thousands who had assembled in the Town Hall of Birmingham, or the Free Trade Hall of Manchester, and had been so enthusiastic in favour of compulsory education, would quickly alter their tone when they found that they were the subjects of such exceptional legislation, and that their towns might still be deluged with ignorance which had been permitted to grow up in the surrounding districts. It was idle for the friends of compulsion to ignore the fact that it could not be applied without, in the first instance, producing considerable hardship upon working men; and it was, therefore, the duty of the Committee to minimize the pecuniary loss which would be inflicted. General direct compulsion would affect the supply of juvenile labour, and, as a consequence, the rate of wages for adults; but, under a system of permissive compulsion, many compensating advantages would come into operation, and wages would not be raised because of the competition of juvenile labour in surrounding districts where compulsion was not applied. The friends of compulsion should carefully weigh the danger of their opponents being able to tell the working classes that they were the victims of exceptional legislation—because they deceived themselves if they thought that those persons opposed to compulsion would not, in many towns, form a powerful party. In places like Liverpool compulsion might be carried at the first election of the school Board, only to lead to agitation against exceptional legislation; and if the anti-compulsion party were strengthened at an ensuing municipal election, and the decision of the present authorities were reversed, it would be ten times more difficult to apply compulsion. It should not be forgotten that individual cases of hardship would be sure to occur, and would be pointed to by the reactionists as justifying them in the course they had taken. It was not dignified for Parliament to leave to the local authorities the decision of a great question. They were told that the people were not prepared for compulsion. If so, was it justifiable to hand the power over to the local authorities? Next Session the Factory Acts would have to be consolidated, the Workshops Act to be amended, and they would have to legislate respecting children employed in agriculture. He appealed to the Government whether all these reforms would not be rendered far more difficult if by the passing of permissive compulsion the Committee sanctioned the extraordinary anomaly that, with regard to children at work, Parliament would decree that they should attend school; while as to those who were not at work, the question whether they should attend school might be left to the shifting and arbitrary caprice of the local authorities?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that a difficulty had occurred to him which had not been mentioned; according to the ordinary rule the greatest punishment that could be inflicted on a boy at school was expulsion. Under indirect compulsion expulsion was still the greatest punishment, and it was the interest of a lad and of his parents that he should remain at school and escape expulsion, otherwise he could not obtain a certificate, which would enable him to get employment. Now, under direct compulsion, this power would be lost altogether. If the parent objected to the boy being at school it would be his interest that he should be expelled, and the boy would probably have no objection. Now, with the present ideas about other kinds of punishment, could discipline be maintained? He did not know whether it had occurred to the Vice President of the Council to consider whether he could devise some substitute by which discipline would be preserved.

MR. DIXON said, he could not on this occasion go into the Lobby with his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett). The Vice President of the Council had intimated that this was not a vital point, and that hon. Members on this question ought to be allowed to vote as they liked. Now, nobody in the House had been in more direct or constant communication with the working classes and others outside the House on this question than he (Mr. Dixon), and he wished to state that during the progress of the Bill through Committee he had received no intimation whatever that it was the wish of the working classes that the clause under discussion should be expunged from the Bill, although there had been full opportunity of taking the question into consideration, numerous meetings having been held in London and elsewhere to discuss the subject. The general feeling outside was so strongly in favour of direct compulsion, that they preferred compulsion in a permissive form rather than not to have it at all; and they regarded the clause as a recognition of an important principle.

Question put, "That the words 'for all or any of the following purposes' stand part of the Clause."

MR. WELBY, in moving that the age during which boys should be liable to be compelled to attend school should be limited to from 5 to 10 years old, said, that as the House had decided that power should be given to compel the attendance of children at school, the question of the limits within which that power was to be exercised became of the utmost practical importance, and he wished to state why he could not approve of the proposals of the Government in the Bill, or of the various modifications suggested. He took his stand on the broad ground that it was necessary that after 10 years old there should be absolutely no restrictions on the labour of boys, such as would be involved by compulsory attendance at school. He should confine his remarks to the agricultural districts, though he believed as strong a case might be made out for the towns, and he would be most unwilling to ask the House to accept any crude opinions or unsupported assertion of his own. The House, however, had at its command ample means for forming a correct judgment, through the labour of the Agricultural Employment Commissioners, and it was on their Reports that he should found his arguments. His quotations, though very short, would in every case, represent a great body of evidence, and he should show from them—first, the immense inconvenience to farmers; secondly, the grievous hardship to labourers which would be caused by keeping their boys at school after 10 years old; and, thirdly, that such inconvenience and hardship were wholly unnecessary. With regard to the farmers, they deserved the most favourable consideration of the House not only on account of the importance of the due cultivation of the soil, but because of the admirable spirit in which they had everywhere met the inquiries of the Commissioners. The Reports of the present Bishop of Manchester, then one of the Assistant Commissioners, and of Mr. Tremeneere, were conclusive of the desire of the farmers and landowners to promote education, by excluding all children under 10 years of age from work. So that, as far as the farmers were concerned, they were quite ready, though at a considerable sacrifice to themselves, to dispense with the labour of boys up to 10 years old. But after 10 it was a very different story. Then, as the evidence repeatedly showed, a boy became of constant use upon a farm, and was usually employed continuously through the whole year. But the case of hardship to the labourer was stronger still. To estimate this, let the House remember that after 10 a boy could obtain continuous employment; but to insist on his attendance at school up to 12 or 13 years of age, even during the winter months, would be to deprive him of his yearly hiring. The farmers might get bigger boys to do the work; but the earnings of the younger ones would be lost to the families, and this would fall hardest on those large families of young children which wanted the money most. What, then, could a boy of 10 years old earn? There were very few counties in England where such a boy could not earn 6*d.* a day. Where he could not the rate of wages was low, and the money proportionately valuable. In some places he earned much more; in Berkshire, for instance, a boy of 10 to 12 earned commonly 3*s.* to 4*s.* a week, with 20*s.* to 30*s.*, or even £2 at Michaelmas. In Yorkshire, boys earned 10*d.* to 1*s.* a day, and in Cumberland and Westmoreland even as much as 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* a day turnip thinning. The earnings of a boy of 10 or 12 years might be taken to average one-sixth of the wages of his father; and frequently, if the father was out of work, he was the only bread-winner of the family: the

and the Commissioners and the Inspectors unanimously stated that such was the poverty of the labouring families that those earnings could not possibly be spared. But, it might be said, this may be all very true and very sad, but educational considerations must be paramount. Was it then necessary, even in that point of view, to keep boys after 10? It would be generally admitted that the amount of education represented by the fourth standard of the Revised Code—that was the power of reading fairly, writing from dictation, and doing sums in the first four rules of arithmetic—was sufficient for a labourer's child. Mr. Tremenhore said—

"It is acknowledged on all hands that when once a child has been able to satisfy the requirements of the fourth standard, it does not readily forget what it has learnt, and that a moderate amount of after application is sufficient to keep up and extend it."

The most valuable evidence on this point was that of the school teachers, who might be expected to lean in an opposite direction. Mr. Culley consulted 16 of them in Bedfordshire and 11 in Buckinghamshire, and said the following might be taken as the answer of them all—"Granted a regular school attendance from five (some say six) years of age up to 10, a child of ordinary ability would be able to read and write, and use the first four rules of arithmetic with facility;" and the school teachers of Northamptonshire wrote to Mr. Norman that there was "a singular unanimity of opinion" among them that, with such schooling as had been already described, a labourer's child at 10 years old "would fairly reach the fifth standard of the Revised Code." There was plenty of evidence that their knowledge could be easily kept up by night schools and similar means which would not interfere with farm work. If, then, in conclusion, it was not necessary to keep boys after 10, was it wise to do so? The House must recollect that even permissive compulsion went far beyond the principle of the Factory Acts, and was to be extended to districts which were utterly unprepared for it. The certainty of inconvenience to the farmers and hardship to the labourers had been proved; you ran the risk, in addition, of destroying what little independence and providence the agricultural labourer now possessed, because to deprive him of his children's earnings would frequently force him to seek the aid of charity in some shape; you ran the risk, too, of outstripping public opinion, and of causing the hostility of the very classes on whose co-operation the success of your measure depended. For the sake, then, of agriculture, for the sake of struggling poverty, for the sake of the general acceptance and successful working of this measure, let the House proceed cautiously and deal gently in this matter. Send the children to school at five by all means; keep the girls there till 12 if you liked; encourage the boys by every possible inducement to stay as long as they could; but do not prevent them by force, after they were 10 years old, from earning all they could towards the support of themselves and their little brothers and sisters. He would beg to move in page 24, line 22, to leave out "children," and insert "boys above the age of five years and under the age of ten years, and of girls."

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, it might be convenient to the Committee, as several Amendments stood on the Paper in relation to the age at which children were to be compelled to attend school, if he stated at once the modification which the Government proposed to make in the clause. As the clause at present stood the school Boards were allowed no margin for discretion; if the by-laws were to be enforced at all, they must embrace all children between the ages of 5 and 12. Perhaps, upon the whole, it would be better to give the districts themselves the discretion of fixing the age at which the attendance should be enforced. He thought, however, it was right that there should be a minimum and a maximum age, and he accordingly would propose, instead of the words "children above the age of five years and under the age of twelve years," to substitute "children not less than five nor more than thirteen years, as may be fixed by the by-laws." Thirteen years would give a greater margin, and in some town districts it might be desirable to have extended limits. He trusted that Amendment would be accepted.

Mr. CANDLISH said, he was obliged to his right hon. Friend for having made this Amendment. He thought, however, the minimum should be fixed at six years instead of five years, which was too tender an age for compulsion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would remind his hon. Friend that the by-laws must be revised by the Education Department.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 24, line 22, to leave out the words "above the age of five years and under the age of twelve years," in order to insert, "not less than five nor more than thirteen years of age, as may be fixed by the by-laws"—(Mr. W. E. Forster)—instead thereof.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was inclined to think that the suggestion of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) was a good one. There were many children of five years of age who, on account of ill-health, ought not to be compelled to attend school.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that that case was provided for.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, he believed it would be a mistake not to retain five as the minimum age at which compulsion might be enforced under certain circumstances. Many children attended infant schools at three.

MR. BAINES said, no doubt many children of three attended school with great advantage; but he agreed with the hon. Member for Sunderland that five was too tender an age for compulsory attendance.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was willing, if the Committee wished it, to make six years the minimum.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he hoped that care would be taken not to discourage attendance at night schools, which tended so much to improve the education of the labouring classes in agricultural districts.

MR. DIXON said, the House had been told that it was very unlikely that these compulsory clauses would be put in operation in the case of children under the age of 10. Under the Factory Act, however, children were worked as early as they could earn wages. It was right, then, that they should go to school early. But they were told that six ought to be substituted for five. The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) was of opinion that it was of great advantage to children to go to infant schools at a still earlier age. They knew that children were often sent to school at three years, and he had heard of cases where the children had only been 20 months old. Any unavoidable cause of absence would be admitted as an excuse. He must express his great disappointment that the Vice President of the Council should have consented to what he (Mr. Dixon) deemed a totally unnecessary alteration.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he did not believe that the slightest advantage was produced by the attendance of children at school at too early an age. They were not sent to school to learn, but in order to be kept out of mischief while the mother was at work. He did not think it would be well to allow school Boards to make compulsory laws in such cases. He thought that parents would like to keep their children at home till six years of age.

MR. MELLY said, it would be well that children should be sent to school without the intervention of the gutter, and without the risk of the fire at home.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said after what he had heard he should be in favour of five.

MR. CANDLISH moved to amend the Amendment, by substituting "six" for "five."

MR. STEPHEN CAVE would vote in favour of "five," as his experience was quite different from that of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish). He had seen children of two years old in infant schools, and though they could not be taught much book learning, and certainly dogmatic theology would run off them like water off a duck's back, yet it was not too early to inculcate good habits. It had been said that we paid too much attention to principles, and too little to habits—that though good principles were good things, strong confirmed habits were better. Certainly, it was never too early to inculcate habits of decency, cleanliness, and order. Besides, children thus brought up learned more rapidly than those who had passed their time in the gutter. The difficulty was to obtain time for education without trenching on the time for gaining a living. He believed that a system of beginning early and ending early would present a solution of that difficulty, and that the infant school and night school would well supplement the ordinary school.

MR. DISRAELI said, he hoped the Committee would not divide. He was prepared to support the proposition of the Government, whether it was "five" or "six," as that was the only mode by which they could make real progress with the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. W. E. Forster) agreed to.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON moved in page 24, sub-section 2, line 28, after "subjects," to insert—

"Or shall require any child to attend school on any day or occasion set apart for religious observance by the religious body to which his parent belongs."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would suggest an Amendment, to the effect that the number of days on which a child should be required to attend school should be raised from 200 to 300.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the number of days' attendance would be regulated by the by-laws in accordance with the circumstances of a district.

MR. FAWCETT said, he should say nothing further on the subject, as it appeared there was to be permissive compulsion, permissive school aid, and permissive time.

Amendment proposed in page 24, line 42, to leave out the words "within one mile" and insert "not exceeding three miles" agreed to.

COLONEL BRISE said, he rose to move as an Amendment, in page 24, after line 43, to insert—

"Where there is no school Board in a school district, upon receiving a requisition from the managers of all public elementary schools in their district asking for the same compulsory powers as given to school Boards, together with a copy of a resolution to the same effect carried at a vestry meeting by a majority of at least two-thirds of the ratepayers in the same district, it shall be lawful for the Education Department to allow these by-laws to be put in force, and they shall have the same effect as if they were made by-laws by a school Board exercising powers under this Act."

His object was to give school managers the power of putting the compulsory clauses in operation, under the conditions he had specified; and though the Government had by a recent Amendment to some extent anticipated his views, he yet thought that it would be desirable for the Committee to adopt this Amendment. He was a firm advocate of the principle of compulsion, for his experience had always been that the great impediment to the spread of education was the difficulty of enforcing the children's attendance. He believed that in the rural districts—he had no knowledge of what might be the case in the towns—persons would be elected under the Act who would be animated by an earnest desire to carry out its compulsory provisions not in the mere letter of the law, but in the spirit of love. They would put it in force with discretion and forbearance, and so enforced there would be little need either of the policemen or of the magistrate. Cases, no doubt, would happen where parents neglected the duty they owed to God and man in the matter of the education of their offspring, and where the children would have to be plucked, as brands out of the burning, from passing all their time in houses where little but foul language and vile habits were to be learned. But he was hopeful that in the main the population would take kindly to the measure. The great difficulty to contend with in his own neighbourhood were the "straw-plaiting" schools. He had found that the attendance at some national schools in his district had diminished from 100 to 35 children, and upon inquiry he found that 50 or 60 of them were huddled together in a so-called "industrial" school; where under the charge of one old woman, they were engaged not in learning to read or to write, but in plaiting straw. In another district, out of 300 children, 150 were similarly occupied. Something, however, was to be attributed to the indifference with which Dissenters regarded these national schools in the management of which they had no share. He hoped that a better state of things would prevail under this Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, while sympathizing with the object of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he must express a serious doubt whether the proposed Amendment would answer the purpose it was intended for. The Government had already consented to words which enabled every district that wished it to apply the compulsory provisions of the Act; but there would be considerable objections to placing the initiative in the hands of the managers, and any such attempt on their part would be sure to be misunderstood. He would recommend the hon. Gentleman not to press the Amendment.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he would propose an Amendment, Notice of which had been given by the noble Lord the Member for Cambridgeshire (Lord George Manners), in line 43, after "child," to insert—

"4. That the child is ten years of age, and holds certificates from an Inspector of having passed the fourth standard."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the first part was not consistent with the clauses already passed, and he should be loth to insert the latter words.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PELL (for Mr. C. S. READ) proposed as an Amendment, in page 25, line 3, after "five shillings," to insert "including costs." He thought the Act would work better without any uncertainty in that respect. The penalties might otherwise become excessive, and might bring the parents to the verge of distress. He would also like to know how often the penalty could be imposed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he concurred in the spirit of the Amendment. His experience led him to think that the whole question of costs, as regarded conviction for small offences, would require reconsidering. When acting as a magistrate he had often felt the hardship of the present system. He, however, did not think the words suggested by the hon. Member would answer. He would suggest that the limit should be fixed at 10s. instead of 5s., for he was afraid that it would often happen that the costs could not be brought within the limit proposed by the Amendment.

MR. DIXON said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment as it stood; otherwise the result would be that the fine would never be less than 5s. It happened only the other day that a girl, 12 years of age, was fined 1s. or 2s. for some trifling offence, and 13s. costs. The latter could not be paid by the father, and the little one was sentenced to go to prison for 10 days. The Committee should be careful to guard against the possibility of such a thing happening under this Bill. He felt sure that with heavy costs in addition to a penalty compulsion would cease in many districts.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, that even for the most trivial offence the costs were seldom less than 8s. 6d., and the magistrates had no power to remit them unless they had put into operation the Act for the payment of magistrates' clerks by fixed salary. He regretted that that wise and just Act was not more generally adopted. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would give them some more definite information as to the probable manner of the operation of this clause, because he saw great difficulties in the way of it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not answer the hon. Baronet's question at present, nor until by-laws had been suggested by various districts. Officers would probably be appointed to warn the parents of every child who was absent from school; but magisterial authority would not be brought to bear until warnings were found to be ineffectual. With regard to the particular question before the Committee, he would suggest the words, "not to exceed such amount as with costs will amount to five shillings."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he approved of the Amendment. Nothing would more impede the working of the clause than making the penalty too high.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. W. E. Forster) agreed to.

MR. DIXON said, he would beg to move, in page 25, line 4, to leave out from "laid" to the end of the clause, and insert "sanctioned by the Education Department." As the clause stood by-laws could not come into operation except during the sitting of Parliament, and consequently a delay of six months might occur. The power of sanctioning these by-laws during the Recess might safely be conferred on the Education Department, which he felt assured would exercise it so discreetly that the subsequent laying of the by-laws on the Table of the House would be a mere matter of form. In Birmingham and other large towns the by-laws probably would not be framed till after the close of next Session, and consequently this part of the Bill would be a dead letter till Parliament met in 1872. It was to remove this inconvenience that he proposed the Amendment.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would support the Amendment. It appeared to him very doubtful whether Parliament ought to be troubled at all with these by-laws. Parliament would be a bad judge while the Education Department would be a competent judge.

MR. HIBBERT said, he thought that after the necessary sanction was given by the Education Department the by-laws should be laid before Parliament in the annual Report. With that condition he supported the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, this Proviso was inserted because it was considered that Parliament might like to keep the control in its own hands. He did not think there would be any educational advantage in retaining the Proviso.

MR. DICKINSON said, he was of opinion some Proviso ought to be made for the improvement of the by-laws.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, there was no Proviso in the clause for the publication of the by-laws in the locality where they were to operate. He thought each locality ought to have an opportunity of expressing its opinion as to the desirability of adopting the compulsory clauses of the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would undertake to carry out the noble Lord's suggestion, and would insert words in the clause to carry out the object aimed at by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon).

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ACLAND said, he wished to ask if the legal expenses connected with the drawing up of by-laws in each locality could be avoided?

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought it a serious omission, that although the school Boards might force children to attend school, the Bill did not empower them to compel those parents of such children who were able to pay the school fees.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would consider the various suggestions that had been made.

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought there should be a summary mode of recovering fees.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he wished to know whether blindness or deafness was to be held as a reasonable excuse for non attendance under this clause? He thought that a clause should be brought up on the Report providing for the education of the blind and the deaf and dumb.

MR. M'LAREN said, he proposed, on the Report, to move words making it clear that the school Boards might devote part of the funds at their disposal to the education of the deaf and blind. He would suggest some such plan as giving the master £2 per annum extra for undertaking the extra duty.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was as anxious as anyone for the education of those persons, but he doubted whether a general Education Bill was the place to make such provision. He would find out whether the power referred to by the hon. Member who spoke last was given to the school Board by the Bill, and if not, he would endeavour to consider favourably the hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

Clause 66 (Application of small endowments).

MR. W. E. FORSTER in moving in page 25, line 25, to leave out "1868," and insert "1869," said, the Endowed Schools Act of 1869 did not apply to endowed schools in receipt of a Parliamentary Grant, and it was proposed now to give power to the Governing Body of such endowments as did not come within the scope of last year's Act to submit schemes if they thought their endowments should not be applied to the reduction of the rates or taxes.

MR. PARKER said, he hoped the Educational Department would have full power to prevent the application of these endowments for relieving the ratepayer.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made, in Clause 66, page 25, line 27, after "Act," to insert as a separate paragraph—

"A certificate of the Education Department that a school was at the commencement of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, in receipt of an annual Parliamentary Grant shall be conclusive evidence of that fact for all purposes."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. PELL said, the Committee was aware that the Education Department at present treated endowments made by persons still living as subscriptions; but in the case of an endowment made by a person deceased the Government Grant was denied to the school when the endowment and the grant resulting from examination amounted to 15s. per head of the average attendance; and in this way the endowment would really be used to relieve the Consolidated Fund. The clause as it stood at present would compel voluntary schools to give up their endowments and to become rate-supported schools, and would prohibit rate-supported schools from accepting the assistance of endowments. The amount of the endowment withdrawn would have to be made up as a charge on real property by means of an education rate. The clause would also prevent the formation of united school districts where any of the schools in the districts held endowments. The subject was a very important one, because in Leicestershire alone the school endowments for educational purposes under £100 per annum were 91 in number, producing an average of £16 per annum for each parish, besides three or four additional endowments given by the Dissenters. Under these circumstances, he begged leave to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 25, line 27, after the word "Act," to add the words "Provided always, That for all the purposes of this Act and of the Parliamentary Grant, any endowment of a school applied by school managers of a public elementary school to educational purposes contemplated by this Act, shall be treated by the Education Department as subscriptions, and if so applied by a school Board, such endowment shall be treated by the Education Department as funds raised out of rates."—(Mr. Pell.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the Amendment of the hon. Member ought really to have been brought forward as a clause in place of the clause in the Bill. The clause of the Government proposed to enable the Governing Body of a school to make any suggestions as to what should be done with its endowments; but if the Amendment of the hon. Member were adopted, and their endowments were to be absolutely applied to the reduction of the rates, the clause might as well be struck out, because no discretion whatever would be left to the Governing Body. He confessed he looked forward to these old endowments being appropriated for the purpose of providing education of a superior character for the more clever boys in the school; but he had no desire at the present moment to anticipate this question, which would have to be discussed in Parliament when the Code came to be considered.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) would accept the Amendment. Its object was to prevent a parish from being deprived of its property. He knew a case where a clergyman in a country parish persuaded his parishioners to have an endowment for giving a dole of bread changed in its application so as to be available for educational purposes. The result was that the Education Board diminished its grant by the amount so realized.

MR. DIXON said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not accept the Amendment. It would be most unjust to apply these endowments towards the reduction of the rates.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, he would point out, as the original founder of the endowment had appropriated that portion of his property for benevolent purposes, it was unfair again to tax the property by means of a rate.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Pell) would be content with having raised the question and would not press his Amendment, to which it was impossible that the Government could assent.

MR. PELL said, he wished to know what was to become of these small endowments. He should not be doing his duty if he did not press the matter to a division.

MR. ACLAND said, the endowments would be dealt with by the Endowed Schools Commissioners if the Amendment of the hon. Member were rejected. He (Mr. Acland) was trustee of two schools which had been struggling for years past to get properly managed.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 23; Noes 103: Majority 80.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 67 to 80, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 81 (Parliamentary Grant to public school only).

MR. CANDLISH said, he would beg to move, in page 27, line 36, after "Act," to insert—

"Nor to any school which is not in receipt of an annual Parliamentary grant at the date of the passing of this Act, unless it is a school provided by a school Board."

So long as religion was taught within secular schools religion was practically being taught by means of Parliamentary Grants. This was contrary to the principle so stoutly and nobly maintained by the Government last year when they resolved that the funds of the disendowed Irish Church should not be applied by way of concurrent endowment. If further denominational schools were brought into existence by this Bill, Parliament would be adopting this year a principle which last year they repudiated. Besides, to do so was to commit a mistake in policy. The country might very well accept things as they were, and acquiesce in the continuance to existing schools of the grants they now enjoyed. But the grant of public money to new denominational schools would cause irritation both throughout the country and in Parliament. By the 14th clause the Government excluded creeds, catechisms, and formularies, thereby reflecting the mind of Parliament. The Amendment was in harmony with the spirit of that clause, and was made with no hostility to the Bill, though the feelings of the Nonconformists, who were at least a moiety of the people, had not been conciliated—he might almost say they had been outraged—on this question. He hoped even now that the Government would accept his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "nor to any school which is not in receipt of an annual Parliamentary Grant at the date of the passing of this Act, unless it is a school provided by a school Board."—(Mr. Candlish.)

Mr. DIXON said, he would support the Amendment. He hoped that his hon. Friend (Mr. Candlish) would go to a Division in order that the country might clearly understand the position which his party occupied in reference to the question. Although there was no hope of the principle embodied in the Amendment being carried, for the Committee had already decided against it, he wished to enter a formal protest against what he considered to be the erroneous and mistaken policy adopted by the Government in this Bill. He objected not merely to giving Parliamentary Grants to new schools to be hereafter erected upon the voluntary or denominational principle, but also to the increase of Parliamentary Grants to existing denominational schools. There existed a wide-spread feeling of disappointment throughout the country on this subject, and it was thought that the result of the adoption of the present policy would be an increase of grants to Roman Catholic schools, and especially to Roman Catholic schools in Ireland. The voice of the country was rising, and he felt it to be his duty to warn the House against the policy they were about to pursue, for it would create religious dissensions which would benefit neither religion nor education.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, while regretting that he was so frequently compelled to differ from the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish), he could not but acknowledge the desire exhibited both by his hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) to promote the cause of religious education. He hoped the Committee would excuse him if he did not go over the arguments which he had had more than one opportunity of enforcing, and he would refer hon. Members to what he had already said in regard to what was called "concurrent endowment." Now they did not consider they were giving grants to sectarian schools. The money that was continued to schools in which there was sectarian teaching was not given to sectarianism, but for the support of the secular element. If efficiency was not supplied by voluntary action, of course it would be understood that the assistance of the State would be withheld. They had got off the religious question, and, important as it was, he hoped they would not get on to it again. Rates had now come to be looked on as a more serious matter than at first, and there would be a considerable increase in them if they threw up the voluntary assistance. Besides, there were throughout the country many voluntary schools which received no Parliamentary aid, but which gave some kind of education to vast numbers of children. He would be glad to see such schools made places where a really good and efficient secular education would be given, and this would mean an immense saving in the rates. But all hope of this would disappear if the Amendment of his hon. Friend was accepted. He thought that as a matter of justice, persons who preferred schools where what was called sectarian teaching was given as well as secular, ought not on that account to be deprived of their share of the public taxes. It would be a mockery to call for voluntary action to supply the deficiency of education, and yet refuse any assistance from Parliament. As to the remark that the clause was contrary to the principle of the Bill, he might be permitted at once to state what the principle was. It was to bring within reach of every cottage in the kingdom a good secular education. It had never been his principle, or that of the Government, to decide by any regulations of the Ministry or even of that House exactly what kind of education that should be. If they attained an efficient secular education they would have effected the object they had in view whether it was accompanied or not by any specific form of denominational education.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT said, it was plain that the country had declared against the denominational system, however his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) might hesitate to accept that verdict. It had been said that they only paid for secular results. But could these different schools exist without the Parliamentary Grant? If not, then the money was a real payment for religious instruction. They should give children a good secular education in order to enable them to make a wise choice in regard to religion. The country condemned the system of supporting sectarian education by Parliamentary Grants because they perceived that such a system of education created separation where unity ought to exist, because it led to waste in an administrative point of view; because it was willing to pay for all religious systems indifferently, being therein immoral from a religious point of view; and because it was a system which was retrograde from a Liberal point of view. He could not help feeling that the measure they were discussing was not so much a Bill as a bundle of permissions.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he regarded it as a somewhat strange circumstance that the country, if holding such opinions as those referred to by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, should not have given any expression to them during the two or three months that this measure had been before the House. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that at the present moment something like 6,000 denominational schools existed in connection with the Church of England without receiving Parliamentary Grants. When the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) declared he spoke on behalf of the Dissenters, who numbered one moiety of the population of the country, he begged leave to say he doubted the accuracy of the hon. Gentleman's figures. At all events, the House would, no doubt, be glad if the hon. Member, when they came to discuss the Census Bill, would furnish them with some proof of the statement, and render some aid in solving the question as to the relative numbers of Churchmen and Dissenters. The hon. Member said that the country was against the extension of the denominational system; but that House represented the country, and the great majority of Members were in favour of this system. He would support the Government, in the belief that it was the fixed determination of the country to afford fair play to the maintenance and legitimate extension of voluntary schools.

MR. HIBBERT said, he could not support the Amendment, because he thought that the Bill gave the greatest liberty to all persons in the country to establish what character of school they pleased. They might establish a denominational school, or an undenominational school—that was, a school in which no sectarian teaching was given, but in which the Bible was read—or they might, under Clause 82, have a school in which no religious instruction was given.

MR. WHITWELL said, he would vote for the Amendment, but on a practical ground, and not for the reasons which the hon. Member for Sunderland had given, as he should be sorry to see the question of religious instruction again brought under discussion. He was ready to support all voluntary schools now in existence, but he was not prepared to establish new voluntary schools. His firm opinion was that the Bill would never come into proper operation until school Boards were established throughout the country, and he did not wish to see one school pitted against another in the same parish. It was only by a common feeling that they could secure the best system of school education.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 70; Noes 190: Majority 120.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had now to propose the following addition to the clause:—

"No Parliamentary Grant out of such moneys shall be made in aid of building, enlarging, improving, or fitting up any elementary school, except in pursuance of a memorial duly signed and containing the information required by the Education Department for enabling them to decide on the application, and sent to the Education Department on or before the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy."

This was in accordance with the intimation made by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government some weeks ago, and to which much allusion had been made in the debates. He had only, in addition, to say that the remarks made by some hon. Members when the rating clauses were under discussion led them to consider whether any assistance could be given in regard to buildings, not so much in the form of grants as of loans, to meet the case of districts where the rates would be felt more than in other places. He was therefore prepared, on the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Melly), to bring up on the Report an alteration in Clause 49. At present that clause contemplated giving power to the school Board to borrow from the Public Loan Commissioners, and to spread the payment of loans over a series of years not exceeding 30. It was stated that this would involve an annual charge of 6 per cent, but that was rather an exaggeration. It would, however, imply  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and therefore they now proposed to alter that clause so as to increase 30 to 50 years, and to put in the clause that the money might be borrowed at  $3\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, which would make an annual charge of about £4 6s. per cent. He believed this would be a greater assistance to school Boards than if the building grants had been continued. The building grants had hitherto been only about one-fifth of the expenses, and in towns where it was difficult to obtain land it was not even so much as one-fifth. At the same time, while making the terms of loan very advantageous, he should think it right to insert in the clause that the building must meet the approval of the Education Department. He moved, in line 36, after "Act" to insert as a separate paragraph, the words of his Amendment.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he approved of the Amendment in substance; but thought it would give an unfair advantage to the rate-paid schools.

Mr. W. E. Forster

The great charge which had always been preferred against the present system was, that it only helped those places which helped themselves, while it entirely neglected those districts which were unable to help themselves. That was the very charge which he brought against this Bill. The rich districts of the country, which were already well provided with schools, were to be assisted, whilst Bethnal Green, Whitechapel, and the other destitute districts which most needed schools, would have to provide them out of the rates, and thus a heavy burden would be cast upon the ratepayers of those districts. That was, in his opinion, a mistake. The only way in which they could truly bring home education to the doors of every child would be to make the rates light; otherwise the people, in course of time, when they began to groan under their load of taxation, would curse the day upon which the Bill was passed. In order to continue the power, which the Education Board now possessed, of making grants towards the expenses of building, enlarging, repairing, and fitting up schools and teachers' residences, he would move, in the last two lines, to leave out the words "on or before the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy."

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he was glad to find that the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) had at length awoken to the importance of the rating question. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had hitherto displayed such a passion for denominationalism that he at one time thought they were prepared to throw overboard their old love, local taxation. He was glad, however, to find that this was not to be the case. The Vice President of the Council had told them that if they lowered the rates they would ruin the denominational schools — in fact, the issue that had been laid before them by that right hon. Gentleman was, that the rates were to be kept up in the country as a protective duty on denominational schools. ["Oh, oh!" and "No, no!"] The question had undoubtedly been put upon that ground by the Vice President of the Council, and it was a fair issue, which the country would understand. Now, he ventured to say that, although hon. Gentleman opposite might care very much about denominationalism, their constituents, whether in town or country, would care a great deal more about the rates. Would they save anything by the money contributed in voluntary subscriptions? On the contrary, about £500,000 was raised yearly by subscription in aid of denominational schools; but they were going to impose a burden of millions of money upon the country in the shape of rates, which were to form a protective duty on denominational schools. What, in short, was proposed to be done was to purchase this £500,000 at the cost of some £3,000,000 or £4,000,000. That certainly was not a very economical transaction.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to state that he had never said, and he was quite sure the Committee never understood him to say, that he was opposed to any reduction of the rate in order to keep up a protective duty in favour of voluntary schools. He was perfectly sure his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Vernon Harcourt) could not find any words of his which ought to give such an impression. What occurred was this—As the Bill stood at present there was a protection in favour of the rated schools, because they would be built out of public money; and as he understood the proposition before the Committee, at the time, to be that assistance should be given to the rated and not to the voluntary schools, he said that would be an increased protection in favour of the rated schools. His hon. and learned Friend nodded assent. Well, then, how could his hon. and learned Friend say that, because he was not in favour of giving increased protection to rated schools he wished to establish protection in favour of voluntary schools? He would leave the Committee to judge of that matter. With regard to the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu), though it was only to strike out two lines, the effect would be to nullify the whole clause.

MR. MELLY said, that the reason why he was opposed to the giving up of the building grants, that they gave the Education Department a guarantee that the schools would be well built.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he hoped the clause, as amended, would be reprinted before the Report was taken.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT said, that he had seen it stated in a newspaper that one person had subscribed £10,000 to the building fund, and another had subscribed £5,000. He had no objection to that. A period of six months should be given to the rate-aided schools for the purpose of securing assistance.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 82 (Conditions of annual Parliamentary Grant).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would propose, in page 27, line 40, after "being," to insert—

"And shall, amongst other matters, provide that after the thirty-first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one—

"(1.) Such grant shall not be made in respect of any instruction in religious subjects;

"(2.) Such grant shall not for any year exceed the income of the school for that year which was derived from sources other than the Parliamentary Grant."

He would combine that Amendment with other words to be moved at the end of the clause—to the effect that such conditions should not give any preference or advantage to any school on the ground that it was, or was not, provided by a school Board. These three propositions, taken together, were intended to carry out views which had been repeatedly expressed—namely, that they would insert in this clause a proviso that the Parliamentary Grant should not be given for religious instruction. He should have to explain, in drawing up the Code, how that would be enforced. At present the Parliamentary Grant was given in two forms. One payment was for results, to be ascertained by examination, and these results being secular in their nature the payment was for secular objects. The other mode in which payment was given was for attendance, and that, too, might be said to be for a secular object. But persons looking into the matter very strictly might consider the attendance to be for religious as well as secular instruction, and, therefore, to carry out the sub-section strictly they would be obliged to frame the Code in such a manner as to prevent any misconception on that head. The next sub-section was to show that the grant, notwithstanding any increase which was looked forward to, should not be more than the income of the school from other sources. He should afterwards move words in order to carry out the understanding, that no advantage or preference should be given to schools on the ground that they were, or were not, provided by a school Board.

MR. G. O. TREVELYAN said, that he had never hitherto ventured to address the House on any question to which he had not given special recent study; but that this question was intimately connected with the motives that induced every man in the House to choose his faith and his party, and that no one could be considered a fit representative who could not give his reason for the course he was going to take. This was the very first opportunity that the House had enjoyed of declaring itself upon the reason why the Bill was so much regarded on the other side of the House, and why it was received with such suspicion on his side of the House. When he and his Friends called themselves uncompromising advocates of unsectarian education, they must hold themselves prepared to show that the changes they advocated were not only tenable in theory, but could be put into practice at once. The Government might have thoroughly satisfied the advocates of unsectarian education. They might have brought in a scheme of secular education, or they might have brought in a comprehensive scheme of unsectarian education by means of school Boards throughout the country. He was very sorry that such an opportunity should have been lost of spreading throughout the rural districts of England the sense of responsibility and public duty. The Government should likewise have taken the training Colleges for masters out of the hands of the denominations into the custody of the nation. Another course still remained to the Government. They might have found some satisfactory definition for undenominational schools, and have applied that definition to all rate-founded schools, and then encouraged all schools to make themselves at once rate-supported and undenominational. The Government had taken half that scheme. They decided that undenominational schools should be the schools of the future, and then they offered a premium to denominational schools to assist them in the competition with those places of education which they had just now deliberately recommended to the nation as models. What he wanted to impress upon the Committee was that this extension of the denominational grant was not part of the Bill, but was a parasitical growth, which ought never to have attached to it, and which ought now to be cut off. This principle was attached to the scheme in order to pass the Bill. In pursuing the course which he did he hoped he should not be considered either squeamish or Quixotic. Private Members stood in a much happier position than Members of the Government, for they were justified in voting for the Bill under protest, at a future time opposing the increased grant; but it would be the duty of the Government to press forward the increased grants, for which every Member of the Government would be bound to vote, however much it might be against the Liberal creed. He was not prepared to incur such an obligation. Hon. Members might think that he held these opinions somewhat strongly; but it must be remembered that politicians of his standing formed their beliefs and aspirations during the Irish Church agitation of 1868, and during that period Scotland and Wales, and many of the large towns of England, pronounced against denominational education. That election was, in large portions of the country, a crusade in favour of religious equality. Very great was the responsibility of confusing ideas of right and wrong by repudiating denominational ascendancy in Ireland, and then pouring out the public money like water in favour of denominational education. He wished to know what they would do in Scotland next year, for surely they could not force a denominational education upon the country against the votes of five-sixths of the unofficial Scotch Members. On the other hand, should they sacrifice their consistency, and allow Scotland to be ahead in the race? And then, what were they going to do in Ireland? Large subscriptions had been made by the Catholics to support their system, and if the Government sought to face the most denominational of all religions with a disjointed policy and an utter absence of any leading principle, he trembled for the result. He had not said enough to express the feelings of those who were anxious to see the Liberal party kept together not for the purpose of securing place, but to carry out great Liberal measures on great Liberal principles. He believed, from the experience of last year, that they need not have been afraid of passing this measure through "another place," for they had proved that if they were willing they were able to carry through that place a great Liberal measure without infringing Liberal principles. And he must say that they regarded too much the wishes of the Church of England in this matter, on account of what it had done for education. They acknowledged that when the country neglected its duty the Church took up the question. The Dissenters were blamed for not having done as much; but they had first to pay for the education of their ministers and provide houses and chapels, while the Church of England had at the commencement £5,000,000 to help them in the competition. Still, though the Church did great things, that was no reason for deferring to its views so far as to spoil a great system of national education. For these reasons he felt bound to oppose the addition to the clause as proposed by the Vice President of the Council and this was why he had taken the painful step of leaving the Government. He knew that in political circles a subordinate who left the Government was regarded as occupying a very undignified position, and one which would be attended with almost fatal consequences to his future career. But there was something which was stronger than self-interest or fear of ridicule, and it was therefore impossible, when something of value was at stake, to vote straight in the teeth of one's creed. He acknowledged the pure and patriotic intentions of the Government, and respected their intentions, as every Member of the party still did, and as he hoped they would do for many years to come. He felt most acutely the accusations of presumption which would be freely brought against him, and nobody could be aware how deeply he regretted the necessity of putting himself in opposition to the Vice President of the Council except that right hon. Gentleman. But, after all, a man must shape his conduct according to his standard of right and wrong; and at this crisis of principle he felt that he could not rank himself against his own convictions.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR: It is impossible not to admire the sincerity of conviction of my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs. He has given the highest proof of the importance which he attaches to the question before us; nevertheless, he deals with this Bill as if it were one for the political education, instead of for the elementary education of the people. Neither he, nor any advanced Liberal, has ventured to exclude denominational schools from the national system which we are about to establish. It would be impossible to do so, for they form the staple of our educational appliances, on which £20,000,000 have been spent in the last 30 years. He tolerates them as they are, and says if we give them no more aid they will undergo a painless extinction. I could understand their exclusion, but not their acceptance as part of a national system on such terms. To allow them to form part of our school system, with an expiring vitality, or with such want of energy that, like paupers, they would fall on the rates and be absorbed, would be unworthy of the nation. If we take these schools they must be rendered efficient, and this increased secular efficiency is the object of the augmented grants. Allow me to commend denominational schools in another point of view, for their evils should not alone be considered. There is no educational subject on which we on this side of the House are so united, as the necessity for compulsory education. Well, I know of no country in Europe in which compulsion has been effectively carried out, without a large infusion of denominational teaching. Holland is most advanced in her school system, which is practically secular, and for this very reason she has been unable to pass a compulsory law. Compulsion, in its very essence, involves resistance, and that becomes too strong for you, if you fight with men's religious convictions when they believe that religion should be taught at school. Prussia and Switzerland have compulsory laws, because the former has a denominational and the latter a separate confessional system of teaching. America, which has its religion of that neutral tint that my Friends near me admire so much, has failed in compulsion, because the religious bodies have not co-operated with her common school system. Baden is the only exception which occurs to me; but even there, if I had time, I could bring proofs in favour of my argument. Hence denominational schools, instead of being opponents, are powerful auxiliaries of compulsory education. The Bill as it stands pays only for secular results, takes ample safeguards for conscience, and by securing a proper efficiency, both in rate and denominational schools, commences the new relations of the State to elementary education, in a fair and promising connection, worthy of the practical character of this nation.

MR. RICHARD said, that he had not hitherto taken any part in the discussions on the clauses of the Bill in Committee, partly because the cacoethes loquendi was not so strong upon him as it was on some hon. Gentlemen, but principally because the House, having listened to him with great patience and kindness while expounding his views on the subject at considerable length, when moving his Amendment on the Speaker leaving the Chair, he thought he could best testify his gratitude for that indulgence by not obtruding himself too often again upon its attention. But he wished to say a few words on the question of the extension of the denominational system that had been raised in the able speech of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan). On that point he believed the Government had been playing into the hands of their adversaries. Not that he had any fault whatever to find with hon. Gentlemen opposite. They were contending for principles which they had always consistently upheld, and on behalf of which they had done valiant battle in the discussions on the Irish Church during the last Session of Parliament, for he contended with his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) that the same principles were involved in this discussion as were involved in those discussions. No one could blame the hon. Gentlemen on the other side for eagerly accepting what was offered them by the Government measure, seeing that it was more, he ventured to say, than they had in their most sanguine moments dared to expect. Perhaps, he ought not to say that they had accepted it eagerly. They were too well versed in party tactics to do that. There was for a time a little make-believe hesitation on the pretence of great sacrifices being required of them. But that did not last long. After a brief interval of "coy, reluctant, amorous delay," they had at length rushed completely into the open arms of the Vice President of the Council, and had been clasped in a fond embrace not without a considerable effusion of tender sentiment on either side, a spectacle which would perhaps have more touched the feelings of some of them on that side of the House if they had not suspected that in that fond embrace their interests were being betrayed. Nor could they much censure hon. Gentlemen opposite for having spoken so much of the concessions they were making, since that also was a boast put in their mouth by the First Minister of the Crown. He had heard of an advocate who had pleaded the cause of his client so eloquently, expatiated with such moving pathos on his virtues and wrongs, that the man himself, being in Court, burst into tears, and declared that he had no conception before how excellent and ill-used a person he was. That was the service which the Prime Minister had rendered to the hon. Gentlemen opposite. He had made them conscious of their own virtues. He had told them of the generous concessions they were making, while, he added, there were no corresponding concessions on the part of the Nonconformists—though what concessions the Nonconformists were expected to make, or indeed could make, seeing they had never enjoyed any exceptional privileges on this or any other subject, he was, he confessed, wholly at a loss to conceive. Be that as it might, hon. Gentlemen opposite were not slow to take the hint of the right hon. Gentleman, and ever since he spoke had shown their determination no longer "to blush unseen." But what were these large concessions? Not the Conscience Clause, for that had been conceded in principle years ago; partly because it was the only condition on which they could receive grants from the Privy Council, and partly also, he admitted, because many of the clergy had become so far liberal as to acknowledge the monstrous absurdity and injustice of compelling the children of Nonconformist parents to learn and recite forms and catechisms which they could not repeat without uttering a flagrant and deliberate falsehood. What other concession was there? Not the exclusion of catechisms and formularies from the rate-funded schools, for they had not conceded that. On the contrary, they had resisted it; had spoken against it and voted against it. The right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote), in moving his Amendment on that subject, advertising to the objections of the Nonconformists to the Bill, had recommended the Vice President of the Council—not in so many words, certainly, but such was the substance and purport of his recommendation—to throw the Nonconformists overboard. A more superfluous piece of advice was never given to any man. That was precisely what the right hon. Gentleman had done. He had thrown the whole body of Nonconformists overboard. ["No, no!"] Why, was there a single Nonconformist body in England and Wales who had not in some form or other pronounced in a most emphatic manner against the Government scheme in its present form? He would first take the powerful and influential body of Wesleyan Methodists, never held to be extreme on matters of this sort. What did his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth (Mr. M<sup>r</sup>Arthur) tell them a few days after the Prime Minister had laid the new version of the measure before the House and the country? He told them that three Committees, appointed by the Wesleyan Body to take the matter into consideration, met and strongly condemned the proposed increase of aid to voluntary schools. There was an ancient and important representative body of Nonconformists known as the Deputies of the Three Denominations of Protestant Dissenters, Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist. They also met under the presidency of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Reed), and had condemned the new proposals of the Government because they left the religious teaching to be decided by local Boards, and extended the denominational system. His hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland had presented a Petition from the Baptist Union, representing, as he stated, some 2,000 churches, utterly rejecting the new scheme of the Government. He had himself, little more than a week ago, presented a Petition from the Committee of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, representing between 2,000 and 3,000 churches, in which they objected to the liberty given to teachers to give sectarian teaching, and to the increase of grants to denominational schools. His hon. Friend the Member for Anglesea had presented a Petition from the powerful body of Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, representing, as the Preamble of the Petition stated, 240,000 persons, in which they declared themselves deeply dissatisfied with the Amendments of the Government. He had presented Petitions to the same effect from large associations of Independent and Baptist churches in North and South Wales. There had been two special Nonconformist Committees, representing various bodies of Dissenters, appointed to watch the progress of the measure—one in London, the other in Birmingham. The former passed resolutions declaring that the last Amendments of the Government did not make any concessions to the legitimate demands of Nonconformists; but, on the contrary, aggravated the exceptionable features of the Bill. The Birmingham Committee uttered their condemnation, if possible, in still more emphatic terms. He now came to the Dissenters of Leeds, and ventured to ask the special attention of his hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines). The account he had before him stated that a meeting of the Protestant Nonconformists of Leeds and the district was held at the Philosophical Hall. There was a large attendance of the ministers and laity, and the mayor (Mr. W. G. Jay) occupied the chair. This meeting passed a resolution to the effect that it found the Amendments of the Government inadequate, and desired to express its conviction that the only thoroughly satisfactory solution of the religious difficulty would be found in the provision of religious instruction by voluntary effort only. He said, then, that this measure was being forced upon the country and through that House in the teeth of the declared wishes and earnest remonstrances of the entire Nonconformist Body of this country; that body, remember, forming one-half of the nation, and much more than one-half of the Liberal party. His right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council was certainly, as he had threatened or promised, "cantering" over the education difficulty. But how was he doing it? Why, by mounting the good steed "Conservative," and charging into the ranks of his friends and riding them down rough-shod. The right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, carry the Bill victoriously through Parliament, as a Government might carry any measure by using the votes of its adversaries to defeat the wishes of its friends; but he ventured to tell him, with all respect, that one or two more such victories would be most disastrous in their influence on the future fate of the Liberal party.

MR. COLLINS said, he had always thought that the liberty infringed upon in this measure was that of the managers of the schools, who were forbidden to teach creeds and catechisms, even though the parents of the children might all wish it. In that consisted the only intolerant part of the Bill, and it seemed strange to him that the advocates of local self-government, of liberty, and of tolerance, were the very persons who had forced themselves upon an unwilling Government, and had driven the Government to adopt the intolerant prohibition to which he referred. Those on that (the Opposition) side had been obliged to submit to the exclusion of catechisms from the schools, and now hon. Gentlemen opposite began to abuse them on that ground. He maintained that the people of England, as well as of Scotland and Ireland, preferred denominational education. The British and Foreign School Society was a Dissenting institution. For his own part, he believed the only schools that were thriving were not the schools of the secularists. As a member of the Church of England he did not hold that anything sectarian was taught at the National schools, for there the children were taught "the whole truth and nothing but the truth." Still he would say that the Government had acted fairly by all parties; but he should regard it as an act of tyranny if the Government not content with having forbidden the teaching of creeds and catechisms in the rate-aided schools, refused to give any grant to those schools which insisted upon teaching them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would not detain the Committee with many observations upon this point, because it must be conceded on all sides that this was merely a repetition of a previous discussion. He could not, however, allow the statement of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. G. O. Trevelyan) to pass entirely without comment. In dealing with the speech of his hon. Friend he could not help expressing his regret that he should have felt it to be his duty to take the course he had done, and his admiration at the conscientious manner in which he had discharged what he believed to be his duty, regardless of his own interests. There would be great cause for rejoicing were all disputes conducted in this conscientious manner. He must confess that he was not at all surprised that the hon. Member should have taken the course he had done, after the speech he had made that evening, because it was evident that he had attacked the question most conscientiously, but from a different point of view from that taken by him (Mr. W. E. Forster) and the majority of that House. It was evident that the hon. Member's desire was to bring not so much elementary education as unsectarian education within the reach of every child, whereas his own object was to secure elementary education to every child. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) found fault with the Government for taking this particular step, and he evidently regarded the Bill as being much worse for the change introduced into it. His best answer to the objection of the hon. Member would be to remind the Committee how it was that he had come to propose these words. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs had stated that the only reason the Government had for introducing them was to enable them to obtain the support of hon. Members sitting on the other side of the House. Now, he had no hesitation in saying that he was most thankful for the support he had so received, because he was anxious that the Bill should meet with the approval of the two great parties in that House. The Government had not made the change to carry out the views of one party more than of another, and the support of the House was given to the proposition by both sides of it; but he rather thought that the support he had received from the opposite side of the House had been much stronger before the change had been introduced into the Bill than after. The Government had introduced this change into the Bill in consequence of another change which they had made. The Government had thought it advisable to strike out from the Bill the principle of voluntary schools receiving aid out of the rates, and thereby to take from those schools that possible and probable great assistance because hon. Members on their own side of the House objected to that principle. Having done that, and because they were anxious to bring education home to every child, the Government had felt it to be but just to give the voluntary schools some assistance in return for the very considerable change that had been introduced into the Bill; but he was quite sure that the Bill as it stood was not more advantageous to the voluntary system than it was when it was first introduced. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought the Bill in its present form would meet with the approval of the great body of the tax and ratepayers. He could only trust that the measure would, when it got into operation, be judged by its results, and he should not fear, even from the Nonconformist party, of which the hon. Member was so distinguished a member, any considerable amount of opposition when they found, as they would find, that it brought education within the reach of every child throughout the country. He believed that it was generally wished throughout the country that along with a secular education such religious education should be given as the parents desired; and with the full conviction that the opinion of the country was in favour of the Bill, he should appeal to the hon. Member not to press his opposition to the Amendment.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he thought no good end could be answered by continuing the more general discussion. The protest that he should otherwise have felt it to be his duty to make upon this part of the Government proposal had been made in such manly terms by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. G. O. Trevelyan), and by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard), that it would be unnecessary for him to repeat it. He objected to the course that the Government had pursued on the matter; but he hoped that the Committee would have the fairness to recognize that both himself and his hon. Friends had not endeavoured to hinder the progress of the measure, although having very strong opinions in reference to it they had felt bound to express them. He did not think the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil had spoken too harshly. He (Mr. Winterbotham) felt strongly that victories like these went far to shake the confidence of the Liberal party. He did not wish to use harsh or extravagant language, because he did not think it likely that any absolute secession from the supporters of the Liberal Government was likely to result from the course taken by the Government upon this question; but he thought that that enthusiasm and utter abandonment of confidence which had maintained them in the proud position they had occupied since they first came into power were not likely to endure—not because the Government had differed in opinion from a large and influential section of their supporters, but because they had treated their objections with something approaching to contempt. Even the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President himself, whose temper had been so unexceptionable throughout these discussions, had said that this was not a difficulty which was felt in the country, but that it was created in Parliament. [Mr. W. E. Forster said he had not made use of that expression.] The language used by the right hon. Gentleman had been generally so understood. He was, however, glad to hear that such was not his meaning. For himself, he regretted the change that had been made in the measure, because he felt that no more effectual challenge could have been offered to the country to continue the agitation, the prolongation of which he himself should deeply deplore. He thought that the Bill upon this point was unwise, and that it was unnecessarily in conflict with the opinions of a large and influential part of the country. However, the Bill being, as he supposed, shortly about to pass, he thought it their duty as good citizens, as good members of the Liberal party, and as Christian men, to try to falsify their own prophecies, and make the Bill work. That he hoped they would endeavour to do; but he also trusted that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would bear in mind what were the feelings of a very large section of his supporters throughout the country, many of whom were dissatisfied with the Bill. It was a fact that the party which was united at the commencement of the Session was not united at the present moment; and that, in place of perfect confidence and trust, feelings of distrust and apprehension had sprung up among them. He should say no more upon the general question. With regard to the proposed Amendment, the first part he thought altogether unnecessary and worthless; and upon the second he had to remark that the managers of the schools would be enabled to maintain the schools as private without expending a single sixpence of their money in keeping them up. On the other hand, was Parliament not to be allowed at any time hereafter to raise any question on this subject? Were its hands to be tied; and was the Committee of Council to be forbidden to recognize any distinction between voluntary schools and other schools? Was it to be obliged to give to one set of schools whatever State aid was given to the other?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was sure the Committee must be tired of hearing his voice. With regard to the first point to which reference had been made, the limitation was one which had been thought advisable in order to meet the views of those who agreed with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Winterbotham); but it did not follow that it would represent all the provisions in the Revised Code. When the Code came to be remodelled it would be necessary to consider carefully all the principles on which grants were made at present, and all that related to the proportion in which grants should be given to money raised by voluntary subscriptions and from other sources. Perhaps he might be allowed to say the Government looked forward to very considerable advantage in an educational point of view from the proposed increase of grants. He thought the country would have great reason to complain if the increase were not given in such a way as to greatly stimulate education. That stimulus ought to be more than proportionate to the increase in the grants. He had been asked why he had not accepted the proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert). The simple reason was this—they found that some of the best schools got on without voluntary subscriptions, because the parents were willing to pay larger fees. There was a Wesleyan school at the south side of London to which there were no voluntary subscriptions, but while the grant to that school was £205, the school-pence amounted to £372. He found that several of the British schools, some Roman Catholic schools, and some Church schools—but a larger number which were not either Church schools or Roman Catholic schools—were in that position. Were the Government to say that those schools were not to have any grant because the parents were prepared to pay more than parents usually did pay, and there were no voluntary subscriptions? The reason those schools were successful was that either the parents had a great deal to do with the management or they had great confidence in the managers. He did not suppose his hon. and learned Friend would be prepared to give a pledge that he would never seek to interfere with the system which this Bill would establish; and, of course, it would be always in the power of Parliament to re-open the question if it thought fit. He hoped they would not have the religious question raised again; but under all the circumstances the Government believed that their proposition was in accordance with what seemed to be the wish of the Committee.

MR. HIBBERT said, he thought the plan of his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not meet the case of the small schools in agricultural districts. He would suggest that with the view of meeting that case the grant should be in larger proportion for the first 100 or 120 children than for those above that number. The rate should be made 6s. instead of 4s. for the first 100 or 120, and then descend in proportion as the number exceeded that. He would also suggest the introduction of the words "voluntary contribution or from any" in that portion of his right hon. Friend's Amendment which referred to the funds in aid of which grants were to be made.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had no objection to the introduction of the words just suggested by his hon. Friend; and his suggestion as to the mode of making grants in the case of small schools would be considered when the Revised Code was being remodelled.

Words added.

MR. G. O. TREVELYAN said, he thought that if the Amendment were put in portions a Division on the part of it that was objected to could be taken in a more satisfactory manner than if the Committee treated the Amendment as a whole.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that in order to enable the hon. Gentleman to take the sense of the Committee as he wished to do, it would be better that, instead of proposing the whole of his (Mr. W. E. Forster's) Amendment at once, he should propose, as an addition to the end of the clause, the first two lines of his Amendment—namely—

“And shall not give any preference or advantage to any school on the ground that it is or is not provided by a school Board.”

LORD AUGUSTUS HERVEY said, he had given Notice of an Amendment which would precede the Amendment of the right hon. Gentlemen—namely, in line 40, after “conditions shall,” to omit “not” and insert “neither forbid nor” before—

“Require that the school shall be in connection with a religious denomination, or that religious instruction shall be given in the school.”

If anything had been shown in the course of these debates and the discussions out-of-doors, it was that the great majority of the people of England were in favour of religious instruction forming part of the primary education of their children, and it followed from this that they would be doing grievous injustice to the taxpayers if they called upon them to pay for the maintenance of schools conducted in a manner which they believed to be most disadvantageous.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he agreed with the noble Lord in thinking that the general feeling of the taxpayers of this country was in favour of religious instruction; but was at the same time sure that their almost universal feeling was that it would not be just to deny any share of the taxation to those who preferred purely secular schools. He hoped that the noble Lord would not press his Amendment.

LORD AUGUSTUS HERVEY said, he would withdraw his Amendment, but would bring it up on the Report.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words “and shall not give any preference or advantage to any school on the ground that it is or is not provided by a school Board.”—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

Question put, “That those words be there added.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 317; Noes 86: Majority 231.

Amendment made—

“Provided that where the school Board satisfy the Education Department that in any year ending the twenty-ninth of September the sum required for the purpose of the annual expenses of the school Board of any school district, and actually paid to the treasurer of such Board by the rating authority, amounted to a sum which would be raised by a rate of threepence in the pound on the rateable value of such district, and any such rate would have produced less than twenty pounds, or less than seven shillings and sixpence per child of the number of children in average attendance at the public elementary schools provided by such school Board, such school Board shall be entitled, in addition to the annual Parliamentary Grant in aid of the public elementary schools provided by them, to such further sum out of moneys provided by Parliament as, when added to the sum actually so paid by the rating authority, would, as the case may be, make up the sum of twenty pounds, or the sum of seven shillings and sixpence, for each such child, but no attendance shall be reckoned for the purpose of calculating such average attendance unless it is an attendance as defined in the said minutes.”

MR. GRAVES said, he would beg to move, to add the words—

“Such conditions may allow of an annual Parliamentary Grant being made to a school on board of a training ship, notwithstanding that the children are boarded and clothed in such ship.”

The boys educated on board those ships were generally taken from the streets; but those ships were not aided, although the reformatory training ships were assisted by Parliament. He thought grants should be given in both cases.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the question was an important one, and it should be carefully considered when the Revised Code was being altered, but he could not accept the Amendment, as the Bill contemplated only the case of day schools, and it was not desirable now to prejudge the question.

MR. NORWOOD said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to the same effect, but including ragged schools and orphan asylum schools within its provisions. After the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) he should, however, not press his Amendment.

MR. GRAVES said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, a great hardship was in many instances inflicted on the small rural parishes, owing to the circumstance that they did not receive a grant unless a certificated schoolmaster was employed in the schools. The condition was one which did not insure that which the Education Department required—that the education should be good—and he should like to see it done away with. He begged, with that object, to move the addition of the words—“or that the principal teacher of the school shall be duly certificated.” He knew his Amendment could not be accepted in its present form owing to the alterations which had been made in the clause, but he would bring it up again on the Report.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was impossible to decide off-hand the difficult question raised by the Amendment. One of the most important points in dealing with the Revised Code would be to consider the conditions under which certificates should be granted.

MR. WALTER said, that when the Bill came into operation, the Education Department must do one of two things—either relax very considerably the present rule—and he thought this would be the right plan to adopt—or make it universally compulsory. The merits of the school should not be supposed to depend on the certificate of the schoolmaster, but on the results of examination. He could mention instances in which two schools in neighbouring parishes had been examined in the same week, one which had not a certificated master and in which the children passed a good examination, but which got no grant; the other where the examination was so bad that the certificated master was soon after dismissed, and which yet got a considerable grant. Under the present system many bad schools received State aid, but they would no longer receive it if this restriction were removed.

MR. KAY SHUTTLEWORTH said, he would suggest a middle course instead of the alternative presented by the hon. Member for Berkshire. It would be most unfortunate if guarantees were no longer taken by the State that teachers should be duly trained for their duties, and if they went back to the old plan of allowing any teachers whatever. Might not some part of the grant be given temporarily—say for two years—to schools where a certificated teacher was not employed, and the condition that the teacher should hold a certificate be then enforced? At the end of the two years all that a teacher would have to do would be to pass an examination.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, he doubted whether, owing to the large increase in the number required, it would be possible to provide a sufficient number of certificated teachers.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would propose to add at the end of the clause the following words:—

“Provided also, That if the total amount which any school Board is required to provide in any year for the purposes of this Act exceeds the amount which can be raised by a rate of three-pence in the pound of the rateable value of the district, one half of the excess shall be defrayed by the Education Department out of moneys provided by Parliament, and the other half only shall be provided by rate.

He proposed this addition because it seemed to be generally admitted that the mode in which rates were levied was not entirely satisfactory, that the incidence of the rate was not equal, and that in order to rectify to some extent this inequality, it was reasonable to devote State funds for the purpose of supplying the deficiency. Another reason for the Amendment was that this measure was not simply of a local, but of a national character, and was proposed for national objects. He did not intend so to relieve the ratepayers as to make it less their interest than it otherwise would be to manage the school economically and efficiently. Half the excess would still fall upon the ratepayers; but his Amendment would conduce to the more cheerful and ready acceptance of the measure in districts where school Boards would be established and schools provided out of the rates than the plan now proposed. In some agricultural districts the school rate would fall heavily upon the tenants of non-resident landlords, and he thought his proposal was a moderate one in the interest of the ratepayers.

MR. LIDDELL said, while approving this Amendment, he thought it would be impossible to agree to it, because they had already inserted words that no preference or advantage should be given to any school on the ground that it was or was not provided by a school Board, and it was quite clear that the Amendment would give an advantage to rate-supported schools as compared with voluntary schools.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Committee had already provided in a better way for the case of exceptionally poor parishes, and it was important to prevent managers losing sight of efficiency of teaching, the motive for which this Amendment would reduce by 50 per cent, while it would offer a temptation to parents not to pay fees.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he thought it important that the maximum of the education rate should be known, and that it should not fluctuate. The union of parishes which had been suggested would, he believed, prove impracticable.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Amendment was not only different from, but absolutely a contradiction of what the Committee had already done; the two were quite irreconcilable.

MR. DIXON said, he was inclined to support the Amendment, and could not see the Prime Minister's difficulty.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he admitted that the two propositions were different, but denied that they were contradictory. They provided for cases that were wholly distinct. He left the question in the hands of the Committee.

Amendment negatived.

MR. J. G. TALBOT proposed that at that hour (20 minutes past 1) they should not proceed further, and he moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that it had been understood that they should go on later that night than usual, and he hoped they would proceed until they arrived at some matter of complication and difficulty.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 84 struck out.

Postponed Clause 22 (Managers may transfer school to school Board).

Amendment proposed in page 9, line 20, to leave out the words from the beginning of the Clause to "arrangement," in line 28, inclusive, in order to insert the words—

"The managers of any elementary school in the district of a school Board may, in manner provided by this Act, make an arrangement with the school Board for transferring their school to such school Board, and the school Board may assent to such arrangement.

"An arrangement under this section may be made by the managers by a resolution or other act as follows (that is to say):

"1. Where there is any instrument declaring the trusts of the school, and such instrument provides any manner in which, or any assent with which a resolution or act binding the managers is to be passed or done, then in accordance with the provisions of such instrument;

"2. Where there is no such instrument, or such instrument contains no such provisions, then in the manner and with the assent, if any, in and with which it may be shown to the Education Department to have been usual for a resolution or act binding such managers to be passed or done;

"3. If no manner or assent can be shown to have been usual, then by a resolution passed by a majority of those members of their body who are present at a meeting of the body summoned for the purpose, and with the assent of any other person whose assent under the circumstances appears to the Education Department to be requisite.

"And in every case such arrangement shall be made only—

"1. With the consent of the Education Department; and

"2. If there are annual subscribers to such school, with the consent of a majority of those of the annual subscribers who are present at a meeting duly summoned for the purpose.

"Provided, That where there is any instrument declaring the trusts of the school, and such instrument contains any provision for the alienation of the school by any persons or in any manner or subject to any consent, any arrangement under this section shall be made by the persons in the manner and with the consent so provided.

"Where it appears to the Education Department that there is any trustee of the school who is not a manager, they shall cause the managers to serve on such trustee, if his name and address are known, such notice as the Education Department think sufficient; and the Education Department shall consider and have due regard to any objections and representations he may make respecting the proposed transfer.

"The consent of the Education Department shall be conclusive evidence that the arrangement has been made in conformity with this section."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

—instead thereof.

Amendment proposed in page 10, line 2, after the word "Board," to insert the words—

"Any school Board may, with the consent of the Education Department, make an arrangement for transferring their schools, or any of them, to a body of managers, duly constituted and approved by the Education Department, and who may be able and willing to guarantee the maintenance of such school or schools for such time and under such conditions as the Education Department may determine."—(Mr. Birley.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not think the proposed arrangement would work well, and therefore he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

[Committee—Clause 22.]

New Clause, to follow Clause 30 (Determination of disputes as to the election of school Boards), (Mr. W. E. Forster) agreed to.

New Clause, to follow Clause 32 (School Board in the metropolis), (Mr. W. E. Forster).

MR. W. E. FORSTER proposed, after Section 5, to add—

"In the City of London the members of the Board shall be elected by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty in Common Council assembled."

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he should object to the City of London being excepted from the electoral scheme, contrary to an understanding with hon. Members.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he must protest against the discussion of so important a matter at so late an hour (a quarter to 2 o'clock). What was the meaning of the word "metropolis?" Was it the metropolis of the Police Act, or of the Metropolitan Board Act, or the Coal and Wine Duty Act?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, what was meant by the metropolis was the district of the Metropolitan Board of Works, under the Metropolitan Management Act, 1855. The exception with regard to the City of London was introduced because it was thought the most convenient mode of election for the City, and would be found as good in practice as any other.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it was understood that the same kind of direct election should apply equally to all parts of the metropolis.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he thought that objection deserved attention, but doubted whether the question could be properly considered at that hour of the morning.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he believed the understanding was, that there should be one uniform scheme, and he hoped that the clause would be allowed to stand without alteration.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he should raise the question on the Report being brought up.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES PREVENTION (METROPOLIS) BILL—(No. 151.)

(The Marquess Townshend.)

SECOND READING. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS TOWNSHEND, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he regretted that a subject of such importance had not been taken up by the Government. If during the Plague of London certain districts had been placed under regulations in order to prevent the spread of the visitation, while in other districts no precautions were taken, it would have been thought very anomalous; yet this was the course the Government were pursuing in applying preventive measures to certain garrison towns, while leaving the rest of the country uncared for. No reason could be given why the civil population should be excluded from the benefit of the Acts, nor why our soldiers and sailors should lose the protection which they enjoyed at certain garrison towns if they removed to other places. London was the very hotbed of the disease; and here, if anywhere, the provisions of the Acts were necessary.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."—(The Marquess Townshend.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY thought that, considering the delicate nature of the subject, he should be consulting their Lordships' wishes by confining his remarks within as small limits as possible, especially as a prolongation of the discussion could lead to no practical result, and was likely rather to injure than promote the cause of those who desired an extension of those Acts. His noble Friend proposed to extend the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts from garrison towns to the metropolis, and ultimately to the whole country. The noble Marquess must excuse him if he declined to follow him through the arguments by which he endeavoured to support that proposal. A Commission had already been issued by the Government to inquire into the operation and effects of the law as it at present stood in relation to this subject. That Commission had been issued at the earnest request and desire of a large proportion of the Members of the House of Commons, and in consequence of a feeling which had been loudly expressed in many parts of the country adverse to the existence of those Acts. Considering that a Commission was sitting upon the subject, it was in his opinion premature now to bring the matter forward. He hoped, therefore, that the Bill would be withdrawn.

THE MARQUESS TOWNSHEND thought that the appointment of the Commission had the effect of delaying legislation upon the subject.

Motion and Bill (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL—(No. 26.) (The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that on previous occasions he had been compelled to postpone the second reading of this Bill, and was again forced to do so, for reasons which he hoped their Lordships would allow him briefly to state. In March last he moved for some Returns on finance and business from the diocesan Courts; but up to the present time, out of 27 dioceses, seven had failed to recognize the authority of their Lordships' House, having made no Return whatever. These seven defaulting dioceses were St. Davids, Chichester, Manchester, Bangor, Worcester, Hereford, and Salisbury. Twenty dioceses had made Returns, but had made them so late that it was quite impossible to have had them printed in time for discussion this evening. With reference to the Returns relating to the registries of the various dioceses, which had long been in a most disgraceful condition, and which were moved for by the noble and learned Lord the Master of the Rolls, Returns had been received from 10 dioceses. His object in moving for Returns of the moneys received by the diocesan Courts was to satisfy the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and several right rev. Prelates, who doubted whether the receipts were as large as he had estimated them. As far as he had been able to read them, he could not say that the Returns were very accurate. He had, however, applied to another source for information—namely, to the Registrar General's Office, in order that he might procure a Return of the number of marriages celebrated yearly by licence and by special licence. He had accordingly obtained a Return of the yearly average number of these marriages for the 10 years 1859 to 1868, inclusive. That average number was 19,861, and the fees paid to the registrars for these licences was £40,226 per annum. This sum by no means represented the whole sum paid to the registrars, for he had shown that the fees levied on the parochial clergy, no Return of which had yet been made, amounted to £20,000 a year—and, indeed, he believed to as much as £30,000. In that case £70,000 a year was raised from the public and paid into the hands of the registrars, while no account whatever had been given of the way in which the money was expended. The Bill having been a considerable time before their Lordships, he thought he was justified in asking them to say Aye or No to its principle; he should, therefore, whether the Returns were ready or not, propose the second reading on Tuesday next, and, if necessary, take the sense of the House upon it.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER, as the representative of one of the dioceses described as delinquents, wished to state that, before leaving Manchester last week, he inquired whether the Returns had been sent in or not—he had made previous inquiries and had endeavoured to expedite the matter—and he was informed by the deputy registrar that the Returns were sent in on Thursday last.

Second Reading put off to Tuesday next.

PRAYER BOOK (LECTIONARY) BILL,

PRAYER BOOK (TABLE OF LESSONS)

BILL—(No. 127.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 (Short title).

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY moved to omit the word ("Lectionary") and insert ("Table of Lessons").

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Substitution of Table of Lesson in Schedule for old Tables) agreed to.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved an additional clause, suggested by the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of York), providing that—

"No suit shall be instituted against any clerk for any offence against this Act in following the Table of Lessons hitherto in legal use, alleged to be committed prior to the 1st of January, 1872."

The Act would come into operation on the 1st of January next; but, as in rural districts the Prayer Books might not be altered by that date, it was thought reasonable that no prosecution should be instituted for non-compliance with it during the ensuing year.

Clause agreed to.

Schedule, Part II.,

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved to omit from the Schedule the paragraph setting forth the "Order how the rest of Holy Scripture is appointed to be read;" to omit the paragraph relating to alternative Lessons at Evening Service, on the ground that this service was sufficiently explained without it, and that it might, by its ambiguity, lead to the inconvenient practice of reading a later chapter of a particular Book before an earlier one.

Amendment agreed to; Paragraph struck out.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK moved to insert in the paragraph permitting "other Lessons" with the consent of the Ordinary to be substituted for those appointed in the Table, the word "special," with a view to limit the permission by the Ordinary of a deviation from the Table of Lessons to special services, as harvest thanksgivings for instance. It was not desirable to make the choice of lessons entirely an open question between the Ordinary and the clergyman.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN said, that according to the Schedule as it stood at present a clergyman who held three services in his church would be obliged to repeat in the evening the same set of Psalms which had been read in the afternoon. This would become a merely mechanical operation with some clergymen, and, moreover, it might happen that mournful Psalms would have to be read on joyful occasions, and vice versa. He therefore moved the insertion of words to remedy this inconvenience.

EARL BEAUCHAMP remarked that the Psalms did not form part of the Lessons, and, consequently, it would be necessary to alter the Preamble of the Bill if the right rev. Prelate's proposal were carried. This might open the door to other alterations, and he therefore trusted their Lordships would not accept the Amendment.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK agreed in the reason of the noble Earl. They were carrying out only a part of the recommendations of the Ritual Commissioners, and were strictly limited to the Table of Lessons.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR appealed to his right rev. Friend to withdraw the Amendment.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN said, he would accede to what appeared to be the general opinion of the House. He might, however, bring the subject forward on some future occasion.

Schedule agreed to.

On Question? That the Preamble be agreed to,

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY moved to omit, lines 18, 19, and 20, the words—

“And such revised Table of Lessons have been considered and approved of by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury and by a Committee of the Convocation of York.”

He objected to anything that might seem to imply that the consent of Convocation was a necessary basis of legislation. If the words were intended to be a mere recital of a fact, he denied that the alleged act of Convocation was in any sense a legal act; and if they were intended as the recital of a fact of no importance whatever they were simply surplusage, and surplusage was very injurious in any Act of Parliament. Any Act of Convocation derived its authority from the subject-matter having been submitted to its consideration by the Queen, and from Her Majesty having subsequently approved the decision arrived at. But this question of the Table of Lessons had not been submitted by the Queen to Convocation, nor had Her Majesty in Council given her assent to the decision which was come to. Again, it was a very curious thing to state in an Act of Parliament that the whole of the Southern Province of Convocation, and only a Committee of the Northern Province had signified their approval. Besides, this was contrary to precedent. The Calendar and the Table of Lessons rested on the Act of 24 Geo. II.; but in the Preamble to that statute there was no reference whatever to Convocation. It might, perhaps, be urged that Convocation was not sitting in the year 1751, when that Act was passed; but surely that circumstance only afforded an additional proof that the approval of Convocation was not deemed necessary. He confessed his estimate of the two Houses of Convocation had not been raised by what had lately occurred. The debates on the subject of the Œcumenical Council seemed to imply a complaint that His Holiness had not invited the representatives of the Church of England to sit at Rome with the other Bishops of the East and West. This was a sign of a spirit totally unsuited to a deliberative and independent body, which was, or ought to be, under no other than the control of the Crown and of Parliament. These, even apart from all other causes, gave him so much distrust of Convocation, that he trusted their Lordships would see the necessity of excluding from the Preamble the words of which he moved the omission.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he was not affected by the severe remarks of the noble Earl, inasmuch as he presided over the Northern Province of Convocation. It was, however, a strange argument to say that because a deliberative assembly had erred on one subject its opinion was worthless in regard to another. He admitted there was no reference to Convocation in the Act of 1751, but for that there was this good reason—that there was nothing on that occasion to take the opinion of Convocation upon, the object of that Act being merely to substitute the New Style for the Old, and on a question of astronomy Convocation had no peculiar claim to be heard. For his own part he did not take a very overweening view of the claims of Convocation; but still he thanked the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack for stating in the Preamble to the Bill that Convocation had approved the new Lectionary. There must be many Members of that House who had not paid very great attention to the details of this difficult and elaborate Table, and who would consequently be glad to know that it had received the sanction and approval of the only assembly which represented the Church of England. He agreed that Convocation had no right to alter a canon or the like without a licence from the Crown; but it by no means followed that, as a deliberative assembly, Convocation was not entitled to express its opinion on important subjects. He trusted he should never again hear such an argument advanced in that House. The Convocation of the Northern Province had fully pronounced its opinion on this subject. Several years ago it passed a resolution to the effect that the Lectionary required alteration, and that resolution was sent to the Ritual Commissioners, and formed part of the materials they had to deal with. Whatever titles the Convocations might have to confidence, they were, at all events, the only legal assemblies of the Church in this country, and this was a question which touched every clergyman and layman in the Church, and therefore Convocation had not seen good to be silent. If the Convocations had incurred legal penalties for expressing their opinion on a question which affected every clergyman and layman, those penalties could, of course, be enforced; but he trusted the noble and learned Lord would retain in the Preamble the statement of a fact which in the minds of many persons would carry considerable weight, and which could be offensive to none.

EARL NELSON, as a layman, concurred in the remarks of the most rev. Prelate, and hoped the noble and learned Lord would retain the words in the Preamble. It was a subject for congratulation with him that what was proposed to be done had been carefully considered by a Royal Commission and approved by Convocation. The insertion of these words in the recital of the Act would be strictly in accordance with precedent. All the great statutes giving the force of law to the Reformation were founded upon resolutions agreed to in Convocation, and the sanction of Convocation was quoted in those Acts. The Act renouncing the supremacy of the Pope and asserting the Queen's supremacy, the Act for giving the cup to the laity, and the Act for allowing the marriage of the clergy were all first agreed to in Convocation; and the preface to the Prayer Book distinctly stated that in the first place a Commission was appointed to compile such a book, and that their report having been considered and endorsed by Convocation, the Sovereign asked both Houses of Parliament to give to that Report the force of law. He could not understand why so much jealousy of Convocation should be felt. It did not pretend to make laws, but only to express the views of the clergy. He hoped his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack would keep the words under discussion in the Bill, for the satisfaction of those who could not accept the new Table until Convocation had approved it.

The Archbishop of York

LORD CAIRNS said, he could not agree with the noble Earl (Earl Nelson) that the insertion of these words in the recital would be in accordance with precedent. On the contrary, he believed that no instance could be found of the recital of an Act of Parliament mentioning the approval of Convocation, unless it also mentioned the fact that the opinion of Convocation had first of all been asked by the Sovereign. It was natural, proper, and desirable that the voice of Convocation should be heard on these subjects; but the constitutional method of ascertaining that opinion was by the Crown communicating to it a desire that it should express its views. He thought, therefore, that there were grave objections to the insertion of these words in the recital. That, he contended, was a constitutional principle which should not be departed from. The Act of Uniformity recited—

"And afterwards the Convocations of both the Provinces of Canterbury and York, being by His Majesty called and assembled and now sitting. His Majesty hath been pleased to authorize and require the Presidents of the said Convocations, and other the Bishops and clergy of the same, to review the said Book of Common Prayer, &c. . . . Since which time, upon full and mature deliberation, the said Presidents, Bishops, and clergy of both Provinces have accordingly reviewed the said Book, and have made some alterations they think proper to be inserted therein, and have presented and exhibited the same unto His Majesty in writing in one Book, the Book of Common Prayer, &c., and His Majesty having duly considered, hath fully approved and allowed the same, and hath recommended to this present Parliament," and so on. He would be sorry to legislate on questions of this kind without having the opinion of Convocation expressed upon them; but the proper and constitutional method of obtaining that opinion was by the Crown communicating to it a desire that it should express its views upon a subject stated, and then the fact that the Act was in accordance with the opinion of Convocation might with propriety be stated in the Preamble.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR stated that the approval of Convocation was cited in the Preamble merely for the sake of peace, and to prevent uneasiness and sensitiveness in the consciences of many. The Bill was founded on the general desire for some changes in the services; and when a body of 20,000 clergymen were required by Parliament to change forms in their services to which they had become accustomed, it was not unreasonable that they should be fortified in their disposition to cheerful obedience by the knowledge that the change enacted had been agreed on by a Royal Commission and approved by Convocation. The time when the Church was supposed to consist of the clergy alone had long passed; but, on the other hand, the clergy, unlike the Nonconformist ministers, were debarred from sitting in the other House of Parliament, and therefore had no voice in either House—because it could scarcely be assumed that the right rev. Prelates in their Lordships' House represented on all occasions the opinions of the entire body of the clergy. Under these circumstances it was fortunate that, to a certain extent, they could make their opinions heard through the Houses of Convocation, which was in a great degree their representative chamber, and it was therefore natural that they should regard with satisfaction the recognition by Parliament of the opinions of that body. The change which it was now proposed to make in the Lectionary had fortunately received the sanction of one House of Convocation and of the Committee of the other. The words had been introduced into the Preamble for the sake of peace, and he hoped that the measure would be received generally with satisfaction.

EARL GREY, while agreeing that this was a matter which ought to be settled in a manner satisfactory to the Church, was not prepared for the retention of the words proposed to be left out. He gladly recognized the right and importance of Convocation expressing its opinion on these subjects, but not that Parliament should be hampered and restricted in its action by words in the recital such as those now proposed. What would be the consequences of the precedent now proposed to be set? On some future and not distant occasion a reform in the Church might be proposed by Parliament to which Convocation objected, and the Legislature would then find itself arrested in its design and limited in its powers of dealing with the national Church by reason of Convocation, which, after all, was not the representative of the whole Church, or even of the whole clerical element of the Church. It was absolutely necessary for the safety of the Church that Parliament should have full power to deal with Church matters as they thought right. Men must, indeed, be blind to the signs of the times who did not perceive that great reforms in the Church were necessary, and that if these reforms were not adopted by the Church from time to time, in order to keep herself in harmony with the wishes of the great bulk of the people, so as to retain their affection and confidence, the national Church could not be preserved. Let Convocation by all means make her voice heard on questions affecting the Church, and let all due regard be paid to that opinion; but he could not consent that she should have the right that would seem to be conferred upon her by the retention of these words in the recital of the Act. For these reasons, though far from regretting that Convocation had expressed an opinion, he felt bound to vote for the Amendment of the noble Earl to omit the reference to Convocation from the Preamble.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he could not help feeling that the consequences predicted by the noble Earl (Earl Grey), as about to follow from the retention of these words, came within the category of what Sydney Smith termed "hobgoblin arguments." The noble Earl had talked about Parliament giving up its legislative freedom. The danger of such an abnegation might, indeed, be serious; but, surely, the power of exaggeration could hardly be carried farther than when such results were gravely anticipated from the insertion of these few words in the Preamble of this Bill; if so, it might be possible to go further, and say that because it was recited in the Preamble that "the Commissioners" had recommended the revised Table of Lessons, in the same manner as Convocation was recited to have approved of it, Parliament had resigned its future power of dealing with questions of this description, except on the recommendation of Commissioners. Such a line of argument could only spring from the undue importance attached to these words, which really were very harmless, though he regretted that the words of the Act of Uniformity had not been more exactly followed. The object of the Government was to effect the great change proposed by the Bill as quietly as possible. They did not want to drag their coats before such of the clergy as might be inclined to pick a quarrel with Parliament over the Lec-tionary. The noble and learned Lord having stated that the insertion of these words would secure the peaceful acceptance of the measure by the great body of the clergy, he should vote for their retention.

BENEFICES RESIGNATION BILL.

(The Lord Bishop of Winchester.)

(NO. 178.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Motion for the Third Reading, read; Debate resumed accordingly.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he desired to say one or two words on the subject of this Bill. Though he was not prepared to say it might not be advisable to provide means by which disabled clergymen might, in certain cases, resign their benefices; he must express his opinion that some of the provisions of this Bill would materially interfere with the rights of patrons of benefices, and, through them, with the interests of the Church. The Bill provided that if a clergyman, incapacitated by age or infirmity, resigned his benefice, the Commissioners were to name the allowance to be assigned to the incumbent so resigning, which was in no case to exceed the amount of one-third of the income. Now, in the case of a living of, say, £150, if a reduction to the amount of one-third were made, the income of the benefice would be reduced to £100 a year. Now, though the patron might have been able to secure for the living a clergyman in whom he would have confidence if the stipend had remained at £150 a year, he would probably be estopped from getting as good a man for £100 a year. Clause 5, which provided for cases in which the clergyman holding a benefice became permanently disabled from mental incapacity, appeared to him to be very imperfect. The Bishop was to move the archdeacon, and the archdeacon was to move the Lord Chancellor; but there was no statement in the clause as to who was to move the Bishop. Again, if the incumbent afflicted with lunacy should recover, the disposition made of his benefice during his illness would be illegal. There was no minimum of age stated, nor was there any definite limitation as to the amount of pension, so that a lunatic clergyman might carry off the whole income of the living. By the 15th clause an incumbent might undertake clerical duties elsewhere than in the benefice from which he retired, and if he did so, then his pension was to be diminished in a certain proportion. What would become of the part of the income so diminished? It must go somewhere. Was it to go to the living from which it was taken when the incumbent retired? If so, the new incumbent of the living from which the former incumbent was pensioned would never know what his income would be, because if the former incumbent gave up the clerical duties he had undertaken elsewhere, he would revert to his full original pension. Moreover, there was nothing in the Bill to prevent a clergyman from receiving a pension on retirement from a living, and afterwards obtaining a foreign chaplaincy, and receiving the emoluments of that office in addition to his undiminished pension. Again, in addition to the pension to be taken out of the stipend of the new incumbent, one-half of the expenses of the inquiry whether the retiring incumbent should be pensioned or not, was to be made a charge on the living. In conclusion, believing the Bill to be exceedingly badly drawn, he must ask their Lordships not to read it the third time.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he did not apprehend that any of the details so ably criticized by the noble Duke were such that they might not have been amended, if necessary, in Committee, had proper attention been bestowed on the measure at that stage. Setting aside for the moment the interest of the patron, let him recall to their Lordships' recollection what the Bill was intended to do. There were many clergymen so broken down by age or protracted labour that they were no longer able to minister in the congregation; and it was for their benefit, and for that of the parishes where they were placed, that this Bill had been introduced. He thought that a most important object; the Bill dealt with a matter of the utmost importance, both as regarded the interests of the parishioners and the interests of the Church. The cases in which the measure would be applied without the common consent of all the parties concerned were extremely few and rare. If, however, it had been necessary further to guard the rights of the patron than was done in the Bill, it was desirable that some suggestion with that object should have been made in Committee. With regard to clergymen afflicted with mental incapacity, when first introduced the Bill was defective; but a clause dealing with that point had been brought up by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack—who would be allowed by the noble Duke to be a high legal authority—which he thought would work beneficially. There were cases of permanent mental incapacity, and cases where a cure of the malady might be hoped for; and the Lord Chancellor would be made the judge of the cases where the incapacity was permanent. There were instances in his own diocese of mental incapacity, in which all parties wished for the retirement of the clergymen, even without a pension, and yet in the present state of the law the thing was impossible. It was really not the patron they had to deal with so much as the parishioners—the people who had to go on year after year under a clergyman who himself knew, as the whole parish knew, that he was no longer fit to discharge the duties attached to his position; and it was to be hoped that their Lordships would not rashly reject a measure adapted to remedy that state of things.

Lord CAIRNS cheerfully admitted that this Bill had been introduced from the best possible motives, to effect what was thought to be a desirable object, and that, at first sight, it looked an extremely plausible measure. There, however, all that he could say in favour of the Bill ended; and he would endeavour to show that there were grave doubts not whether the details of the Bill should be altered, but as to the propriety of their Lordships passing it at all. It had been assumed that there was an analogy between the present Bill and the Bill to which their Lordships assented last year, dealing with Bishops who were anxious to retire from their sees; but there was no real analogy between them. In the case of a Bishop who was incapacitated from transacting the proper business of his diocese, things practically came to a dead-lock, and they had to choose between leaving the diocese without the proper care and attention of a Bishop at all, and authorizing him to retire on certain arrangements being made. On the other hand, when an incumbent was superannuated, from ill-health or infirmity, he had a remedy which the Bishop had not, for he could employ additional curates under his own superintendence, who could relieve him to any extent of his duty, and he would still remain the head of the parish. But, according to this Bill, there were no reasons assigned or grounds on which an incumbent might apply for his resignation. If any clergyman applied for a commission, a commission might be issued, and he would then state the reasons why he was desirous of resigning, which might be that he was too old or too young; or that he was ill or expected to be ill; or that he was unpopular in the parish, or that the parishioners were unpopular with him—or any other reason that he might allege. If the Bill passed, he believed it would be acted upon in a great number of cases: and would their Lordships sanction a measure which would have the effect in the course of a year or two of carrying off from many of the parishes of England one-third of the emoluments provided for the spiritual necessities of the parishioners—one-third of the fund which—as they were reminded when the Sequestration of Benefices Bill was before them—was the fund intended to be expended in relieving the spiritual wants of the parish? Was it desirable in the interests of the parishes themselves, that so large a sum should be carried off from the benefice? Supposing one of their Lordships to have the advowson of a living of £1,200 a year. The incumbent might be old and infirm, and the patron might already have selected an active and able clergyman whom he meant to present to the living as soon as it became vacant. But the present incumbent suddenly resigned under this Bill, carrying off one-third of the income, which would thus drop from £1,200 to £800. The clergyman who might have been willing to take the living at £1,200 a year was unwilling or could not afford to take the responsibilities at £800 a year. The other £400 a year might make all the difference to him. The patron, therefore, could not get the best man, and was obliged to appoint a man at £800 a year, whose services might not be so profitable to the parish as those of the other might be; and thus they saddled the parish with an inferior man for the rest of his life, because they would not wait for a vacancy likely, perhaps, to occur before long from a natural cause. First, they did a wrong to the patron, and then to the parish whose interests they desired to serve. Then, under this Bill, nothing could be easier than for a clergyman who preferred to live abroad, or in a more agreeable climate, to carry off one-third of the emoluments, and superadd to them the emoluments of an English chaplaincy at a foreign station.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, there was a provision that if the incumbent took other duties, his pension would cease; or would be diminished by the amount of his emoluments.

LORD CAIRNS said, that as he read the Bill, it meant that in the event of the clergyman undertaking clerical duties elsewhere, his pension was to diminish in such proportion and for such period as the Bishop of the diocese to which he formerly belonged, and the Bishop into whose diocese he went might determine. But did that apply to the case of a foreign chaplaincy. He thought not. Then there was another extremely serious matter. Had the right rev. Prelates who had introduced this Bill considered what effect it would have on the law of assignments? If this Bill became law, they would not only require a measure dealing with the next presentations, but a much stronger measure dealing with advowsons. He could not conceive anything more likely to provoke danger to the best interests of the Church than the transactions which would spring up in advowsons and next presentations the moment they passed this Bill. He took the same objection to the Next Presentations Bill as to this. The error in both cases, was that the Bills went to make the livings void, instead of providing a remedy to meet the evil which might have arisen. Let the Bishop be enabled, if the holder of the benefice did not exercise all the power which he ought to possess, to require that provision should be made out of the income of the living for the proper performance of the duties of the parish, and that would be sufficient to meet the difficulty. But let them not make the living void, because, if they did, they would bring about a multitude of resignations and produce a state of scandal in the Church which could not be too much deplored. At this late period of the Session, it was not possible to proceed further with a measure so defective in many of its provisions; and the same objections applied to another measure of a similar description which was now before their Lordships. He thought the better course would be to defer the consideration of the whole question, the importance of which he fully admitted, to another Session.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL said, that notwithstanding the ingenious and extremely plausible arguments of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns), he believed that the Bill would provide a remedy for a very great evil which now existed in the Church. The noble and learned Lord had stated that there was no analogy between the Bill passed last Session with respect to the retirement of the Bishops and the measure before their Lordships. According to the noble and learned Lord, the Bishop could not supply his own place in case of infirmity as the incumbent could, because the latter had only to employ curates. But where was the money to come from? And which was the best position for a parish—to be ministered over by a man who had no connection with it, or, when the incumbent retired, by a well-chosen, healthy, and active man who had taken his place? It was just as bad for a parish, quod a parish, to be left to the superintendence of a weak incumbent as for a diocese to be left without the superintendence of a Bishop. It had been said very ingenuously that an incumbent would only have to fill up the schedule and say that he was not very well; or, perhaps, would not be very well tomorrow, and he would be allowed to resign. But what would the Commissioners be doing all that time? The Commissioners, at all events, would be honourable men, and might be supposed to have some interest in the parish. One of them would be the rural dean or archdeacon, the incumbent would nominate another, and the Bishop another; and was it to be supposed that the Bishop would appoint a person that would be likely to allow any such abuse as had been suggested? Then objection had been taken to the words "a magistrate for the district." He submitted that these words meant a magistrate for the district in which the benefice was situated. Was not the Bishop to be supposed to take some interest in the parish—and if the incumbent should put forth some false reason for resigning, was the Bishop likely to be so much among the stars as not to be able to come down and test the matter? If the Commission were to be appointed in the manner provided by the Bill, he ventured to think that at least five-sixths of the objections urged on the other side would disappear. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) took a living at £150 a year, and said if they deducted £50 from this small income it would be almost impossible to fill the place; but if they could get a really good man for £150, he did not know that it would make so much difference to take away £50. Any person who had experience in filling up these small benefices must be aware that it was just as difficult to find a good man for an income of £150 as of £100. But the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) took a very different case—namely, a living of £1,200 a year, and, deducting £400, said—"You can get only an inferior man for £800." But he (the Bishop of Gloucester) would be happy to undertake to supply any number of really good, first-class men for livings of £800 a year. He was sorry to say the clerical profession, like other professions, was crowded, and a living of £800 a year was considered a very good prize. It had been said that English parishes might, under this Bill, be made to supply foreign chaplaincies; but there was a restraining power, and he thought their Lordships might fairly leave the matter to be adjusted between the Bishop of London and the Bishops of the other dioceses, as all of them would be concerned in preventing any parish from suffering wrong. Believing that the measure was fraught with great good to the Church at large, he confidently recommended it to their Lordships' favourable consideration.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that at this time of the Session it was extremely difficult to attend to all the business that came before their Lordships; but when attention was called to this measure, which affected the working of a large number of parishes, it was obvious that there were in it such defects as should prevent its being sent down in its present shape to the other House. After the arguments that had been advanced, he could not conscientiously vote for the Bill passing this stage in its present condition. He suggested that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

LORD DYNEVOR said, that although he was very much interested in the success of this measure, he could not but see that it contained many defects, and thought it would not be satisfactory to the House of Commons. He therefore hoped their Lordships would refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER said, he could not acquiesce in the suggestion of his noble Friend, because he entirely denied that there was in the Bill such a crowd of defects as had been suggested. The first defect that had been pointed out was that the 5th clause—that relating to lunatic clergymen—bore no mark of a legal mind, and one noble Lord had suggested that it was prepared by the clergy in Convocation, who were not lawyers. The clause, however, was one which the clergy had never seen before the Bill was printed; it was drawn by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and corrected by one of the most eminent members of the legal profession in the other House. He admitted, however, that the clause needed an alteration, which could be effected by inserting, with respect to the stipend, the simple words "not exceeding one-third of the value of the benefice," and if the Bill were read a third time he should propose such an Amendment before the Bill was passed. The use of the word "district" was an error, and could be amended by substituting the phrase "petty sessional division." He thought any difficulty which might arise in respect to a foreign chaplaincy would be obviated by giving jurisdiction in the matter either to the Bishop of London or the Bishop in whose diocese the living in question was situated. The real objection to the Bill was rather that his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) thought that the rights of patrons were not sufficiently regarded; but nothing injurious to those rights had been shown in the course of the debate. He did not believe that there was in the Bill anything which would injure such rights; but that, on the contrary, patrons would gain more than any other persons, because, instead of having a living occupied for many years by an utterly unfit man, a patron would be able to secure his patronage, and to present a man of strong health and fully capable of fulfilling the duties of his living. Believing that all the errors which had been pointed out might be very easily amended, he asked their Lordships to give a third reading to the Bill.

On Question, That the Bill be now read 3<sup>d</sup>?—Their Lordships divided:—Contents 29: Not-Contents 18: Majority 11.

Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that it would be necessary to introduce several verbal Amendments in the Bill, and one clause had been inserted in the wrong place, although it had no inherent defect.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was now confirmed in his belief that the Bill was not the production of a legal mind. He thought the Amendments ought to be printed, in order that it might be seen how far they would affect the Bill. He had no wish to impede its progress; but he understood the right rev. Prelate intended to amend almost all the clauses.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON wished to know what was the opinion of the Government on the subject.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER pointed out that the printing of the Amendments would delay the passage of the Bill.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the points appeared to him to be minor ones.

After a few words from Lord CHURSTON, Amendments made.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

NAVY—SIR THOMAS SYMONDS.

QUESTION.

MR. CORRY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Sir Thomas Symonds was invited to resign the command of the Channel Squadron in the midst of trials of great importance, and when only one-half of the period during which such commands are usually held had expired, in exchange for a Vice Admiral's Good Service Pension which he had earned by long and distinguished service, and by his position at the head of qualified candidates on the Vice Admirals' List; whether Sir Thomas Symonds expressed to the First Lord of the Admiralty his earnest desire to be permitted to retain his command, the Good Service Pension, which he had accepted, remaining in abeyance until its termination, in conformity with the provisions of the 6th and 7th Clauses, under the head of Pensions, in the Order in Council of February 22nd, 1870; whether Sir Thomas Symonds was specially commended by the First Lord of the Admiralty for the good he had done, and was doing, to the Squadron, and received a Board Letter of thanks for his able and zealous service, and the state of the discipline of the Squadron; and, whether, although he was ordered to haul down his flag on the plea of his appointment to a Good Service Pension, the command of the Channel Squadron was almost immediately afterwards offered to another

Vice Admiral (by whom it was declined), to whom the Good Service Pension had been given on the same day as that on which it had been conferred on Sir Thomas Symonds?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, I think the House will agree with me that the Questions put by the right hon. Gentleman are of a most unusual nature; and, coming from one who has been himself First Lord of the Admiralty, rather surprising. There is no duty performed by the First Lord of the Admiralty more delicate and responsible than that which relates to commands and good service pensions; and, if, without any imputation of malfeasance or corruption, the House of Commons is to be the arena for discussing questions of this kind, based upon rumours which hon. Members may hear or read in the papers, this most important duty will be rendered far more difficult unless it is desired that the government of the Navy should be undertaken by the House itself. I therefore most respectfully decline to answer so much of the right hon. Gentleman's Question as relates to reports whether particular employments were offered to this or that officer, or as to what the opinion of the First Lord may be as to the merits of any particular Commander-in-Chief. Nor would the House, I think, expect me to give minute explanations as to the circumstances under which good service pensions are awarded to particular officers; and I will only say that I believe the First Lord of the Admiralty has faithfully carried out the provisions of the late Order in Council, which placed these pensions on a much more satisfactory footing than the previous system, under which, practically, seniority was almost the only consideration. As to the particular case of Sir Thomas Symonds ceasing to be Commander-in-Chief of the Channel Fleet the right hon. Gentleman is entirely in error. Sir Thomas Symonds elected to strike his flag soon after his intended return, not the other day, but on the 3rd of April last. He was then virtually second Vice Admiral on the list, and as he would be superseded on promotion (which then appeared probable before the end of the present year), he was offered either to remain in command until superseded in due course, and to take his chance of a pension, or to strike his flag soon after he returned, with a good service pension which was then vacant. He elected the latter, his words being—"It would be agreeable to me on the terms you propose; I consider it a very great honour." It so happens that no admiral has since died, and if Sir Thomas Symonds had elected to retain the command he might have had it for a few months longer; but in that case the good service pension would not have been awarded to him, considering the claims of other officers employed as well as himself.

MR. CORRY: I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman, Whether the short answer of Sir Thomas Symonds which he has just read was not sent by telegram, and in cipher; and, whether Sir Thomas Symonds did not subsequently write to the First Lord a letter in which he requested permission to retain his command of the Channel Fleet, the Good Service Pension remaining in abeyance in conformity with the terms of the Order in Council; and, whether he did not dwell upon the great hardship to which he had been subjected by the Board of Admiralty?

MR. BAXTER: I must put it to the House whether I can be expected to reply to such a Question without Notice.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to put a Question, but, if necessary, would give Notice of it. He wished to know, Whether Admiral Drummond was offered the command of the Channel Fleet?

MR. BAXTER: I have already stated that I must respectfully decline to answer Questions of that sort.

IRISH LAND BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Lords' Amendments considered.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 2, line 31, read a second time; several agreed to; one amended, and agreed to.

Page 2, line 31, leave out "£10," and insert "£4," the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved to disagree to the Amendments made by the Lords in the scale of compensation in page 2, line 31, by which £4 was substituted for £10, and £20 for £30. He did not think that any statement was necessary on the subject. He need only say that the Government were entirely unable to assent to any such reduction as that contemplated by the other House.

MR. DISRAELI said, that they had not followed the usual course. They had not received from Her Majesty's Government a general view of the alterations to which they did not agree. They did not know what the Government wished them to accept, and what they did not. It was desirable that they should have some general view of the course Government intend to recommend.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he understood that, in cases of that kind, when a great number of Amendments upon important Bills came down to the House of Commons at a late period of the Session, it was hardly possible, and it was not in accordance with the general practice of the House, that by notice of a formal character the course to be taken should be pointed out. The right hon. Gentleman asked for some general explanation from the Government as to the Amendments which they proposed to adopt or reject. With regard to that matter, he was in hopes that it had been settled and understood, for all substantial and practical purposes, by the explanation which had taken place in the House of Lords. But as he thought the right hon. Gentleman had made a reasonable demand, and provided that he (Mr. Gladstone) was not held in this multitude of Amendments to too literal a precision with regard to matters of secondary importance, what he should say would be that the Government proposed to agree to the greater part of the Lords' Amendments, and that the exceptions would be these—The Government disagreed from those Amendments which affected the scale, and also from that which concerned the term of lease, put into the Bill as an alternative to the scale. He thought it would be felt that those two views of the Government hung together, and were equal weights in the two opposite scales of the balance. They should, therefore, ask the House to restore 31 years instead of 21 years as the term of lease. They also objected strongly to an Amendment made in page 3, though he did not think it was a subject about which special interest was felt. The Government proposed to agree, with some reluctance, to the Amendments which had been introduced by their Lordships with regard to the building of cottages. They would disagree from the Amendment respecting permissive registration of improvements, and from part of the Amendment in the clause which defined what was, and what was not to be considered as disturbance by the act of the landlord. They proposed to amend slightly Clause D of their Lordships, and he believed that these were the only exceptions to a general concurrence in the Amendments which it was necessary to mention. An Amendment had been introduced to enlarge from 20 to 35 years the powers of limited owners. In matters of general legislation, there could, perhaps, be no objection to that; but it seemed to go, in the present case, beyond the analogy of the Bill, and the Government did not contemplate extending the powers of limited owners further than they were affected by the other provisions of the Bill. The Government proposed to accede to the Amendment of the Lords which restored the term of notice to six months from 12 months, to the Amendment for leaving out the 66th clause with respect to the Law of Distress, and to the Amendments made in the Definition Clause.

MR. DISRAELI said, that he certainly preferred the Amendment of the Lords, and he should ask the House to divide on the subject.

DR. BALL said, that all the difficulty of the clause, which, in the Lords, had been called an "arithmetical puzzle," and of the original words of the Bill, would have been obviated if the scale had been a more graduated one, and if there had been smaller intervals between one class and another. It had been hinted that the Government would attempt to introduce a more graduated scale; he did not know whether it was possible that the clause could stand over in order to allow this attempt to be made; but he would suggest that something of the sort should be done in order to meet the difficulties of the Lords, and to prevent any injustice being done.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment." — (Mr. Chichester Fortescue.)

Lords' Amendments disagreed to.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 3, line 24, read a second time; several amended, and agreed to, with a consequential Amendment to the Bill; several disagreed to.

Page 3, line 24, leave out from the word "Section" to "3," in line 41, the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that in Clause 3, after "£250," he proposed to disagree to the Amendment made by the Lords, and to re-introduce an important paragraph, which had been struck out. It would run, with a slight Amendment, as follows:—

"Any tenant in a higher class of the scale may at his option claim compensation under a lower class, provided such compensation shall not exceed the sum to which he would be entitled under such lower class, on the assumption that the annual value of his holding is reduced to the sum (or where two sums are mentioned the highest sum) stated in such lower class, and that his rent is proportionately reduced."

In order to understand the intention of the Government in reference to the Bill as it left the House of Commons, the scale must not be taken in its naked form, but as governed by the provision he had referred to. The inevitable effect of the scale, if not tempered by this provision, would be to effect gross inequality between different tenants holding at different steps of the scale, and whose rental or valuation might only vary, perhaps, to the amount of a single £1. With regard to the provision itself, he was aware that it had been designated an arithmetical puzzle; but he did not know that anything could be devised simpler or more practicable than the plan suggested by the Government. It was not pretended that an exactly accurate maximum would be obtained in every case for each tenant in Ireland, but substantial justice would be done to all, and it was for this purpose that he proposed the reinsertion of the provision struck out by the Lords.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the question was a very difficult one to understand; but he understood that the Amendment was designed to remedy the operation of the scale, which would otherwise give a tenant with a rent of £19 a compensation of £95, while a tenant with a rent of £21 would only get £84. On that understanding he could not object to the Amendment.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought it absolutely necessary to insert the Proviso of the Government in order to arrive at a rough equity instead of strict justice; but it might have been avoided by using more precise and accurate language in the table. If they took £10 as a constant multiple, and gave seven years' rent as compensation for the first £10, and four years for every £20 afterwards, that would give every man what he was entitled to.

Lords' Amendment agreed to; Proviso inserted.

Amendments of the Lords, in page 3, lines 5, 7, 12, and 13, agreed to.

Lords' Amendment, page 3, line 22, after ("writing") insert—

("Or lets the same or any part thereof in conacre, after he has been prohibited in writing by the landlord or his agent from so doing").

MR. B. SAMUELSON moved, that the House do agree to the Amendment made by the Lords, but with this addition, to insert after "conacre" this Proviso, "save for the growing of potatoes or other green crops, the land being properly manured." It was very desirable that conacre of a destructive character should be prohibited; but to prohibit it altogether would be to effect a revolution in the condition of the labourer which would be extremely injudicious, and he must say extremely perilous. The system of part payment of labourers by an allotment of land was so much in accordance with the habits and feelings of the labourers, that he could not see how any amount of money payment would make up to the labourers for the loss. It would also be impossible to utilize the manure which was collected by the labourers in the neighbourhood of small towns. On these grounds he proposed that the House should agree to the Lords' Amendment with his Amendment.

SIR JOHN GRAY expressed a hope that the hon. Member would not press the Amendment, and would leave the important question to which it referred entirely in the hands of the Government. There were certain stages of a great measure like this in which private Members ought not unduly to interpose, and he trusted a Motion would be made from the Treasury Bench to disagree with the Lords' Amendment. The Irish Members were agreed upon this—that the Lords' Amendment would be destructive to the Irish labourer, who had nothing in the world but his little dung heap, which was a mine of wealth to him through the year. Such a step would drive the Irish labourer into discontent and disaffection. He had no right to complain of the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson), whose intelligent support of the cause of Ireland they must all respect; but it would have been better if he had communicated with the Irish Members before proposing this Amendment. He could state that the old con-acre was destructive to farming, but that had now altogether died out. The present system was in no way injurious. He hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. KAVANAGH said, he hoped that the hon. Member for Banbury would not withdraw his Amendment, and that the Government would consent to it. The landlords of Ireland could have no possible objection to a system so guarded, while it would be a great boon to the labourer. Great misconception was entertained as to the origin of the word con-acre. It was used originally to mean land let for the growing of corn; but now it was applied to the letting of a small piece of land for any purpose whatever. It was plain that the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) did not understand the real sense of the Proviso proposed by the hon. Member for Banbury. He had given them a piteous account of the labourer's dung heap; but the very object of this Proviso was to enable the labourer to turn it to account. He was in the habit of letting land to his labourers himself, and all the farmers round him did the same. He hoped the Government would agree to the Amendment.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny quite misunderstood the Amendment of the hon. Member for Banbury. It was absolutely necessary that the farmer in Ireland should be enabled, as he had ever been, to give land in con-acre which was required, not for the purpose of growing white, but green crops. So much did he approve of the Amendment that he had prepared a Proviso almost word for word the same with that proposed by the hon. Member for Banbury. He hoped, therefore, that while the Government would not accept the Amendment made in the House of Lords, they would agree to that of the hon. Member for Banbury. If the Bill were to pass without having anything done by it for the labourers, it would be received with execration throughout Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could not, on the part of the Government, undertake to accede to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Kilkenny to propose to disagree from the Lords' Amendment, for two reasons. When the Bill was originally before the House there was a general concurrence among hon. Members that a distinction ought to be drawn between the con-acre for the purpose of white and of green crops, it being, for the most part, admitted that for the one purpose it was injurious, while for the other it was beneficial—though perhaps that was not clearly expressed in the Bill as it went to the Lords. That was the first reason why he could not assent to the proposal of the hon. Member for Kilkenny. The other was, that in dealing with an Amendment made by the House of Lords in a great measure such as that under discussion, the Government ought, he thought, to be prepared to consider it not altogether on the merits of the point immediately involved, but also with reference to its bearing on other Amendments as well as on the passing of the Bill. Now, if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) were adopted, the passing of the Bill would, he was afraid, be to some extent endangered. The question for each hon. Member to ask himself was, whether he considered the object in view of such importance as to run that risk. The Government certainly could not accede to the proposal. As to the proposal of the hon. Member for Banbury, he believed it to be a good one in itself; but with respect to that also he must say he should not like to risk the passing of the Bill by calling on the House to accept it. The Government, at the same time, would gladly yield to the general expression of opinion in the House on the subject should it be found to be in favour of the Amendment. It was something that it was supported by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh), whose views on the subject were entitled to the greatest weight, not only because of the ability and intelligence which he had brought to bear on the discussion of the Bill, but from the strong desire which he had shown to promote the welfare of his country.

Mr. MAGUIRE thought the Amendment was a very great misfortune, and hoped hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House would follow the advice which had been given by the hon. Member for Carlow. This was not a question of party, and everyone ought to endeavour to make the Bill as palatable as possible to the lower classes.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON observed that when the Bill was before the House on a former occasion, he had drawn the distinction between the two systems of con-acre referred to by the Prime Minister, and had advocated the adoption of a proposal similar to that now made by the hon. Member for Banbury. He trusted the Amendment would be agreed to.

Words inserted.

Lords' Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Lords' Amendment, line 24, leave out from ("section") to ("3") in line 41.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved that the House agree to the Lords' Amendment, by which certain exceptions from the general effect of the clause, which were intended to give the tenant the power of setting aside pieces of land for the purpose of building labourers' cottages, were struck out. If he were simply to consult his own wishes, he should prefer the Bill as it dealt with that point in its original shape; but the matter was one with regard to which he did not, for the reasons which had been just stated by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, think it would be wise to insist by dissenting from the Amendment. The importance which was attached to the provision with respect to the building of cottages had, he thought, been greatly exaggerated by the friends of the labourer, for the security which the Bill would give the tenant-farmer could not fail to react most beneficially on the labourers whom he employed. The question of encouraging the building of cottages, he admitted, was one which ought to be dealt with; but he did not think it could be done so to any useful purpose in the present Bill, and, as he had stated at a former stage of the Bill, he hoped to be able hereafter to propose legislation on the subject which would have the effect of improving the law as it stood.

Mr. SYNAN regretted that the Government had accepted the Amendment of the Lords, which did not place the labourer in the position in which he ought to stand. It deprived the tenants of all power of erecting cottages for their labourers, and left it entirely in the hands of the landlords; and, in many instances, the tenants would be deprived of the power of keeping labourers on their farms. The condition of the labourers was becoming very alarming, and every effort ought to be made to improve their position; and he hoped the Government would insist upon restoring the clause to its original form.

Mr. M'CARTHY DOWNING observed that it was utterly impossible for labourers in portions of the county which he represented to get plots of ground on which to build cottages. The result was that they were driven into the neighbouring towns, where the rates had in consequence been so increased that some of the small shopkeepers were at the present moment half bankrupt. The Government, he added, should provide for such a state of things, for if the Amendment were agreed to, and it was allowed to continue, it was impossible to say what another winter in Tipperary would bring forth.

Mr. GLADSTONE acknowledged the able assistance which had been rendered in the passing of this Bill by the hon. Members for Cork and Limerick—[Laughter—and was sorry to take on this occasion a course which they did not approve. He did not see why such an acknowledgment should be considered an unfitting one, for the support of these and other Members representing Irish constituencies was of the utmost consequence in passing a Bill which was founded upon moderate principles, and which the Government hoped to make acceptable to the people of Ireland. With reference to the present position, it should be remembered that the Government carried those provisions with much difficulty even through this House. Undoubtedly, they were regarded with more of jealousy and apprehension than of favour, and not upon narrow grounds. The Bill proposed to set up the right of the tenant to erect cottages for the labourer against the will of the landlord. To this the objection was raised not only that these cottages might be of an indifferent character, but, in conformity with English experience and practice, that the best landlords were perhaps the most jealous of allowing labourers on their estates to be housed by their tenants. It was more the kind disposition of the House to attend to the recommendations of the Government than the judgment of the House itself which induced them to pass these provisions; and, as they might raise a serious obstacle to the passing of the Bill, he did not think it right to insist on them, especially as the House would not thereby abandon the hope of legislating in a separate shape on the subject of labourers' cottages. Whatever the convictions and desires of the Government might be, it was their duty to sacrifice them to the general prospects of the measure.

SIR JOHN GRAY reminded the right hon. Gentleman that under the Bill as it left this House the tenant was not to erect a cottage for the labourer without applying, in the first instance, to the landlord or his agent. He regretted the course which had been taken by the Government; but he did not think it desirable to throw any obstacle in the way of the passing of the Bill.

DR. BALL repudiated any notion that, in supporting the Lords' Amendment, he and those on his side of the House were actuated by any want of interest in the condition of the Irish labourer. On the contrary, when the Bill was in Committee, he, with several hon. Friends, some of whom were large landed proprietors in Ireland, spoke strongly as to the want of better cottages for the labourers. But the clause as it stood did no good whatever for the labourer; because it offered no standard as to his dwelling, and provided no means of improving or alleviating his condition, and it was liable to be used not for the benefit of a bona fide labourer, but to facilitate subdivision in favour of relatives of the tenant, who would be introduced under the guise and assumed character of labourers. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the House could not legislate for labourers in the present Bill. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. W. H. Gregory) had proposed a number of clauses laying down certain conditions with regard to the labourers; but everyone felt that it was a new scheme, relating to a different subject from that dealt with by the Bill. In supporting the Amendment, he repeated the desire of his hon. Friends to assist the labourer in every possible manner.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, he thought that no such danger would arise under the clause, which was quite sufficiently guarded by the Proviso. If it had been allowed to stand, tenants would have applied to their landlords for cottages; the landlords would have erected them rather than allow the tenants to do so, and thus the example would have spread of providing commodious and decent cottages for the labouring population in Ireland. He could not help regretting deeply that in this Bill there was not now a single provision for the benefit of the poorest and most neglected portion of the Irish people.

MR. BAGWELL thanked the Government for giving way on this question, believing that the clause would have led to the subdivision of the land, and have afforded no real benefit to the labourer. The 9th clause gave the landlord the power of taking land for the building of cottages, and he was sure the labourers were in a much better position than they would have been if the Bill had remained in its original form in this respect.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS said, he hoped there would be no opposition to the Amendment, for if the clause were passed as it left the Commons it would be inoperative, or else mischievous. Bad cottages would be built, because there was nothing to prevent it.

MR. MAGUIRE said, the argument based upon the 9th clause implied that unless the landlords built cottages there were to be none built, and yet it was notorious that it was chiefly by the landlords that the cottages had been levelled. Under these circumstances, it was most tyrannous to say that a respectable tenant should not build cottages, for how could a man cultivate land without labourers? Energetic men were leaving the country every day, and it was bad policy not to give them some inducement to remain in it.

Mr. Gladstone

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, it must have gratified the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Downing) to hear from the head of the Government that he had given great assistance in the passage of the Bill, for he believed the general impression was that the hon. Member had given them many heavy and wasted hours. Throughout the debates hon. Members on the opposite side of the House had pointed out that it was the labourers of Ireland who required assistance much more than the tenants, and now that it was too late to do anything for the labourers, the hon. Member for Limerick and others were calling out that the labourers of Ireland ought to have something done for them. The result must be to sow the seeds of agitation in Ireland, and to do more harm to his unhappy country.

MR. BRUEN said, he thought there was some misapprehension as to the effect of accepting the Lords' Amendments: as he read the clause it did not say that no one but the landlord was to erect cottages; while the tenant might take his plan to the landlord and ask permission to build, and no landlord would refuse to have such an improvement carried out. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) rated the landlords too low when he supposed they would arbitrarily and unreasonably stand in the way of improvements being made in the interest of the labourer.

MR. MURPHY said, he did not agree with the Lords' Amendment. A good tenant would never be refused by his landlord permission to build a cottage; but this Amendment passed in the other House, while it would not be of much advantage to the owners of land, would, in the present position of the country be looked upon, if not with hostility, at all events with great disfavour. He regretted that the Government had not found it to be consistent with their duty to disagree with it.

SIR JOHN ESMONDE said, that if he were a labourer he should much prefer to have the assurance just given by the Government that this question would be dealt with next Session, to the Proviso which had been struck out by the House of Lords, under which—as no conditions were imposed as to the description of cottages to be erected—it would be in the power of any occupier to build hovels instead of proper dwellings for his labourers. He should support the Government in the course adopted by them, which only involved a delay of a year, or rather nine months, and which he believed would tend much more than the re-insertion of the Proviso to elevate the condition of the labouring class.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth agree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue.)

The House divided:—Ayes 396; Noes 29: Majority 367.

Page 4, line 1, leave out the word "thirty - one," and insert the word "twenty - one," the next Amendment, read a second time.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE proposed to disagree to the Amendment of the Lords. The House knew that means had been taken to enable the Courts under the provisions of the Bill to consider all the circumstances of the tenant's case; and he held it very unadvisable to enact that the existence of a 21 years' lease, which was not in accordance with Irish habits or opinions, should exclude a tenant absolutely from claiming any privilege under Clause 3. In accordance with Irish ideas, a lease, to be of any great value, must be for 31 years. He therefore moved that the House do disagree to this Amendment.

MR. DISRAELI said, he would not delay the Committee with further discussion on a Bill which had been debated so fully on previous occasions. The Amendment of the Lords appeared to him to be one which was entirely justified by the circumstances of the case. Twenty-one years was a common tenure in England and Scotland, and it had been found perfectly adequate to all the circumstances which should attend a good lease. In the present case they were asked to grant a lease of 31 years, which under the Bill might be enjoyed without making any improvements whatever. That appeared a condition of affairs highly undesirable for them to support, and he should, therefore, ask the opinion of the House on the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment." — (Mr. Chester Fortescue.)

The House divided:—Ayes 262; Noes 186: Majority 76.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 7, line 4, read a second time; several agreed to; several amended, and agreed to, with a consequential Amendment to the Bill.

Page 7, line 4, to insert, after the word "pounds," the words—

"5. Where the Court shall be of opinion that in consequence of its being proved to have been the practice on the holding, or the estate of which such holding forms part, for the landlord to make such improvements, such presumption ought not to be made:

"6. Where from the entire circumstances of the case the Court is reasonably satisfied that such improvements were not made by the tenant or his predecessors in title:

"Provided always, That where it is proved to have been the practice on the holding, or the estate of which such holding forms part, for the landlord to assist in making such improvements, such presumption shall be modified accordingly."

And also insert Clause A—

("Permissive registration of improvements.")

"Any landlord or tenant who may be desirous of preserving evidence of any improvements made by himself or by his predecessor in title, before or after the passing of this Act, may at any time (subject to the provisions hereinafter contained) file a Schedule in the Landed Estates Court, specifying such improvements, and claiming the same as made by himself or his predecessors in title; and such Schedule so filed shall be prima facie evidence that such improvements were made as therein mentioned: Provided always, That notice in writing of the intention to file such Schedule, together with a copy thereof, shall be given by the landlord to the tenant for the time being of the holding on which such improvements shall have been made (or by the tenant to the landlord, as the case may be,) within the prescribed time before applying to the Landed Estates Court to file the same; and if the person receiving such notice shall dispute the claim made by such Schedule, either wholly or in part, he shall be at liberty within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner to apply to the Civil Bill Court to determine the matter in difference, and in such case such Schedule shall not be filed unless or until leave shall have been given to file the same either in its original or in any amended form by the Civil Bill Court; Provided also, That before filing any such Schedule proof shall be made in the Landed Estates Court by statutory declaration that the notice hereby required has been duly given, and that no application has been made within the prescribed time by the party receiving such notice to the Civil Bill Court; or (if any such application has been made) that leave has been given by the Civil Bill Court to file such Schedule," the next Amendment, read a second time, and agreed to, as far as insert Clause A.

Mr. Disraeli

Lords' Amendment, insert new Clause A (Permissive registration of improvements).

MR. B. SAMUELSON moved in line 1, to leave out the word "or" and insert the word "and." He explained that as the clause had been agreed to by the House of Lords a registration of improvements could take place by an action being taken either by the landlord or the tenant in the Irish Landed Estates Court. The object of his Amendment was to prevent any registration of improvements taking place except at the joint instance of both the landlord and the tenant.

Amendment proposed to the said Clause, in line 1, to leave out the word "or," and insert the word "and,"—(Mr. Samuelson,)—instead thereof.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Banbury unnecessary. He should adhere to the clause as it came from the Lords, the object of the clause being to prevent the great injustice which might possibly arise where the landlord and tenant were not prepared to come to an agreement of the kind which had been suggested.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, he did not see the necessity for this registration clause at all, and it would encourage at once a multitude of what he might term quasi suits. The landlord would come to the Court to register improvements; the tenant would employ an attorney; and out of the 600,000 holdings in Ireland there would probably be several thousands of these quasi suits. He maintained that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Banbury was necessary, and that without it the Government would not accept the clause. They had always been opposed to such a clause, and one reason why they were disposed to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member was because they were anxious to go as far as possible in the direction of meeting the wishes of the House of Lords, without altogether departing from the determined opposition which they had always entertained for the principle embodied in the clause.

Dr. BALL said, it would be better to meet the Amendment of the Lords by a direct negative than to propose a change which, while it appeared to offer something, really offered no advantage at all. The object of the Lords' Amendment was that either party might obtain the permanent record of a fact. It was not necessary for the two parties to agree between themselves as to the fact. If, indeed, they were both agreed—which was substantially the proposal of the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson)—what was the advantage of going to the Landed Estates Court? The clause inserted by the Lords was to meet the very case in which they did not agree, and it was because they did not agree that the clause was requisite. He denied that the clause would give rise to litigation. It would be used only where it was right that it should be used, and where there was something to be recorded; and, considering the large transactions which might be involved, it was only just to both parties that such a clause should be retained. The clause offered a fair and reasonable means of disclosing the obligations on an estate without injustice to anyone; it would never be used to injure or oppress anyone; and he therefore hoped the Lords' Amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated with clearness the object and effect of the clause, which constituted the very reasons why the Government could not accept it. It was not intended for cases of dispute; but, in order to avoid possible controversies in the future, it was thought necessary to create an unknown number of controversies at once in cases respecting which, in the vast majority of instances, controversy would never otherwise arise. In many cases, by lapse of time, improvements would wear out without being the occasion of dispute; and in others the parties would agree without appealing to the assistant barrister. The Government did not wish by this Bill to create any temptation to parties to involve themselves in disputes prematurely; and they were very unwilling to expose the tenant to the danger which lurked under the clause—that of being taken up to the Court in Dublin by a timorous or suspicious landlord. To a small tenant that unnecessary process would be an expensive one. The Government opposed the clause quite irrespective of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Banbury, which of itself was a valuable one and could do no harm to either party. It would provide that where they were agreed there should be an authoritative record, and that would meet the case of encumbrances; but that case did not weigh heavily on his mind, because the charges in question could be only the result of additional value conferred by improvements, and such charges were very different from those which detracted from the value and security of property. On the whole, they would do wisely not to agree to the Lords' Amendment; but it would not be without advantage if they agreed to that of the hon. Member for Banbury.

COLONEL WILSON - PATTEN said, that if the clause would enable the landlord to take advantage of the tenant he would oppose it; but he looked upon the clause as essential for carrying out the provisions of the Bill, and had it existed prior to the Encumbered Estates Court a great part of the discontent now existing in Ireland would have been avoided, because purchasers would have known what charges their estates were liable to.

Mr. SYNAN said, the proper course for the Government to take was to meet the clause with a direct negative. The fallacy in the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) was that the tenant was a free agent, a proposition which was negatived by every part of the Bill. A small holder would rather give up a claim than go to law with his landlord.

Mr. G. B. GREGORY said, anybody having the slightest legal experience must know that nothing prevented litigation so much as clear and distinct statements of facts put in writing while well remembered. The clause would provide for the carrying out of such a plan. He agreed with his right hon. and learned Friend in thinking that without this provision it would be most difficult to deal with estates in Ireland.

Mr. BRUEN said, that while claims for compensation could be advanced at any time by the tenant, other claims could be made only in consequence of the landlord's own act; this it was that placed claims for compensation upon a different footing from other claims; and it was only fair that the landlord should have full information when it could be afforded him without doing injustice.

MR. STAPLETON said, the hon. Member seemed to overlook this point, that if this clause were not passed there could be no litigation unless there was a change of tenancy within 20 years, which change was the exception and not the rule; but if the clause were passed there might be quasi litigation whenever an improvement was made.

Question put, "That the word 'or' stand part of the Clause."

The House divided:—Ayes 186; Noes 249: Majority 63.

Amendment agreed to, with Amendments.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 8, line 8, read a second time; several agreed to; one amended, and agreed to.

Then the Proviso of the clause relating to Notice disagreed to.

Lords' Amendment, page 8, line 7, after ("rent") insert "or for breach of any condition against assignment, subletting, bankruptcy, or insolvency."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE moved to agree to that Amendment of the Lords in the first part of the clause, but to retain the latter part of the clause, in which another Amendment was made, as it originally stood.

MR. SYNAN complained that the Government now proposed to adopt an Amendment which had been moved in that House and rejected without a Division.

MR. GLADSTONE observed that it was quite a mistake to suppose that this Amendment had been moved and rejected without a Division. It was quite a different Amendment.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

On the next Amendment, which struck out the words—

"Unless the Court decides that it ought on special grounds to be so deemed in the case of a person claiming compensation on the determination by such ejectment of a tenancy existing at the time of the passing of the Act, and continuing to exist without any alteration of rent up to the time of such determination."

DR. BALL said, these words gave a very wide discretion to the chairmen of Courts, the Government proposition being wholly unrestrained. There was no subject on which greater apprehension was felt by the landlords of Ireland than this clause, because they considered that there ought to be in the Courts the greatest facility for enforcing the payment of rent. This clause, however, gave extraordinary powers to chairmen, without affording them the slightest guide or [definition of the principle on which they were to act. The Lords' Amendment appeared to him to have two advantages—first, it defined what were the cases in which a chairman might exercise his discretion; and, secondly, it totally excluded the idea of disturbance on the ground that the rent was too high. He asked the Government to be content with the wide discretion given in the Lords' Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government never concealed their opinion that this, although a necessary enactment, was a grave one. Having adopted it from a conviction of its necessity, they applied to it all the limitations which occurred to them, or were suggested by hon. Members. The clause when so modified was assented to by the Government, and no Division was taken upon it. Under these circumstances he hoped it would not be considered extraordinary if he could not assent to the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue.)

The House divided:—Ayes 248; Noes 171: Majority 77.

Amendments, as far as the Amendment in page 9, line 2, after the word "claim," insert Clauses B and C:—read a second time; several agreed to; one amended, and agreed to, with a consequential Amendment to the Bill; one disagreed to.

Page 8, line 2, after the word "claim," insert Clauses B and C, the next Amendment, read a second time, and agreed to, as far as the Amendment insert Clause B inclusive.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE proposed that Clause B be agreed to.

MR. M'MAHON said, he hoped the Government would not agree to Clause B, because it would be a great injury to the tenant. It would neutralize the whole of the Bill.

MR. MC CARTHY DOWNING agreed with the hon. Member for New Ross, and thought that the Amendment was one of the most important made in the other House. The assignee ought to be protected against the act of the landlord four or five years after taking possession.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE agreed that the point under discussion was one of the most difficult in the Bill. It had received the most careful consideration of the Government both in that House and in "another place," and he trusted the House would not undo the work that had been done with a view to the settlement of the question.

Amendment agreed to.

Further Consideration of Lords Amendments deferred till this day.

TRUCK ACTS.

MOTION FOR A COMMISSION.

MR. MUNDELLA, in rising to call the attention of the House to the operation of the Truck Acts, and to move—

"That, public representations having been made to the effect that systematic evasion of the Truck Acts prevails extensively in the Coal and Iron mining industries in Scotland, as well as in other trades and places in the United Kingdom, this House humbly prays Her Majesty to appoint a Commission of Inquiry into such alleged offences, and to take such steps as She shall be advised for obtaining from Parliament any special powers that may be required for conducting such inquiry, or for suppressing such offences."

In dealing with this question, he should only lay before the House facts which were beyond dispute. Within the last few weeks there had been Petitions presented to the House, signed by upwards of 80,000 miners, complaining of their grievances, and particularly of the infringement and evasion of the Truck Acts in Scotland, and if no extraordinary circumstances had recently transpired, there was quite sufficient in the matter of those Petitions to induce the Government to order an investigation. In the early part of last year The North British Daily Mail, published in Glasgow, sent a Commissioner through the mining districts to investigate the complaints made by the miners and the workmen in the iron manufactories of Scotland, and the mode in which they were dealt with by the truck system. In 1867 a Committee of that House reported that fearful abuses prevailed in England, and more especially in Scotland, in connection with mines; that owners of mines, contrary to the intention of the Truck Acts, made large profits by means of their store shops, which they induced their workmen to deal at by various means; and that the present law required alteration in order to render it more effectual. The letters which had appeared in The North British Daily Mail on the subject were written with striking ability, and the statements they contained were given with the utmost circumstantiality. The subject having been taken up by the leading organs in this country, the hon. Member for Ayr (Sir David Wedderburn) put a Question to the Home Secretary, inquiring whether any steps were likely to be taken with regard to it. The Home Secretary, in reply, stated that if the question were brought before the House in some tangible shape it should receive his best consideration. On the 17th of July of last year a most able leader upon the subject appeared in The Times, calling upon that House to investigate the question. The conclusion of that article was as follows:—

"We certainly trust that the Home Secretary will think it his duty to institute a searching investigation into the matter, and to cause the Act to be enforced with rigour against all offenders; and if, as at present framed, it is insufficient against the noxious practices, to take the proper steps for its amendment. But the surest remedy is the extinction of the 'long-pay' system. To this end, employers, operatives, and the public should contribute their utmost."

That article was one of the most forcible summaries and epitomes of the whole question that it had been his lot to meet with. When they remembered that it was only in 1831 the Truck Acts were first passed, and saw all the good which they had done, he was quite sure he would not call in vain on the House to extend and perfect their beneficent action. Looking at the evidence which was given before the first Committee, it was difficult to realize that we were living in the same country, so great was the change which had taken place, the truck system being entirely unknown now in Lancashire, where it at one time overshadowed the prosperity of the working classes, and being replaced by a co-operative system, in which £5,000,000 was turned over every year, a profit of £10,000 a week going into the pockets of the working men. In 1854 an inquiry was instituted into the truck system in Scotland, and Mr. Hill Burton reported how generally the truck system prevailed, and how baneful were its effects. The people found it impossible to get a few pounds out of the owners of mines, even for the most necessary purposes. Since then the iron trade had greatly developed, and he was sorry to say that the evil had kept pace with it. Magistrates, and men in high social positions, were depriving working men of their hard earnings by one of the most cunningly-devised schemes of evasion of law this country had ever witnessed. There were three branches of the system. The first was what was known as "poundage"—it could not be dealt with under the Truck Acts; the second was "truck" pure and simple; the third was "truck" by evasion. The system, as a whole, and its several branches, found an important auxiliary in what was known as "long pay." There were two systems of reckoning in Scotland—one the 14 days', and the other the month's reckoning. The fortnight's was, in practice, a three or four weeks' reckoning, and the month's reckoning, in reality, extended over five or six weeks. Now, everyone knew that, as a rule, workmen and their families were not in a position to do without their wages for such a time. Every employer knew by experience that short payments were the best for the workmen, and that it was of great advantage to the family of the workman that his week's wages should be paid on the Friday, in order that the man's wife might be able to go to market in good time. In the Scotch works to which he was referring, if a man wanted an advance of say 10s. out of the money he had earned, it was made to him; but he had to pay interest for it at the rate of 1d. in the 1s. or 1s. in the pound, so that from 800 to 900 per cent per annum was paid by the poor workmen for advances made to them on the security of wages which they had earned. The "truck," pure and simple, was so dangerous that the large employers did not adopt it. Small employers and middlemen were the persons who practised it. The more complicated truck system was that generally in use, and he would explain it to the House. An Act of Parliament required that the men should be paid in coin. How was that observed in the letter and broken in the spirit? A workman went and asked for an advance of 10s. out of the money he had earned. The advance was given him, and an entry of it was made in a little book, which was taken away by the person getting the advance. Close to the building in which the advance was made, but outside that building was a store kept by some stranger; but the goods in which were the property of the employer, who paid the wages and made the advance. On the counter of the store the workman laid down his money; and, in return, he got what was called "a line." This line was an order on the store for goods to the amount of money laid down by the workman. Spirits were sold in those stores, and he might mention that before the Mines Commission it was shown that one Member of that House held 11 spirit licences. In the orders of lines, whiskey was entered as "A. Q." With £50 an employer could make advances nominally amounting to £400 or £500; because, no sooner was an advance laid down on the counter of the store than it was returned to the employer's cashier. In some cases a slide was used to facilitate the transfer of the money from the store to the employer's counting-house. It occasionally happened that a man tried to "slope" the store; but if he did slope it, a little cross was made on the leaf of his advance-book, and the next time he presented himself for an advance, nothing further was said than that no advance could be made to him. The House would see that there was an engagement required from the workpeople that they should deal at the store; but by the plan of crossing, or, as it was termed, "staking" the books, sloping the store was prevented. Sometimes the books of all the members of a man's family, if they worked in the same employment, were staked; and if a man continued to slope the store after his book had been staked, he was discharged from the employment. He was glad to say that there were some honourable exceptions; and he might particularly mention the firm of Messrs. Baird, of the Gartcherie Ironworks. The system he was describing was repudiated by some employers. He held in his hand original documents — "staked" books and "lines" — which showed the manner in which the system was worked. He would give the House some idea of the kind of supplies furnished under that system. A number of samples sold at the stores were placed in the hands of a respectable wholesale provision merchant and a respectable wholesale grocer for examination, having come from a store belonging to a large iron manufacturer. The reports made contained the following:—

“Sugar, short weight and bad value; cheese, American, short weight and very dear; sugar, bad value, short weight,  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. in  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb.; cheese, 3 ozs. instead of 4 ozs.; sugar, short weight, quality good,  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. deficient in  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb.; cheese, short weight and dear,  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. deficient in 4 oz.”

The examiners further said that having made a careful report of seven different kinds of teas, they considered that the supplies made by retail shopkeepers were 1s. per pound better in value than those supplied by the stores. Some fusion which was supplied to miners at 3s. a yard was found to be only equal to what was sold at retail shops in Glasgow at 2s. 4d. He did not accuse the employers of being guilty of that practice of short weight; but these things only showed how demoralizing the effects of the truck system were upon all who were connected with it. The storemen had certain quantities of goods handed over to them, and what was the result? Why that the storemen cheated both the masters and the workmen. In one instance a storeman died with £10,000 in the bank to his credit, which the masters endeavoured to seize, alleging that their stores had been robbed to that amount. He (Mr. Mundella) had examined 11 exhausted “lines” and found six of them to have been added up wrongly, the errors in every case being against the workmen. The whole 11 lines were from one man; and if the mistakes they contained had been made partly on one side and partly on the other, there might perhaps have been some excuse for them; but it was a significant fact that, he repeated, they were all against the workmen. In asking the House for a judicial inquiry, he would not adduce all the details which he could easily bring forward, many of them even worse than those which he had stated. All he asked was that the House would support him in seeking for an investigation that they might know whether those things were so or not. There was the law and there were the facts; let them know how the matter stood. If his allegations were not substantiated then his case broke down; but if it was substantiated let them have some legislation which the House itself, which a Committee had demanded, and which the workmen had earnestly prayed and now generally looked for. The influence of the truck system on the workmen and their families was most demoralizing. When those poor people went to lay out their hard earnings at the stores they were frequently treated rudely and discourteously; and if a man had a claim to 4s., and got 3s. 7½d. worth of goods, it was simply a question of what he would have the remaining 4½d. in, and he was often induced to take it out in whisky on the spot, every facility being given to men and women to indulge in drink. The truck system reduced the people to a state of practical serfdom, while it also encouraged reckless habits of improvidence and intemperance among them. Nor was the evil of the system confined to the workmen only. The ironmasters who paid their workmen in coin were exposed to an unfair and most unequal competition with those who paid in “truck.” The condition of the Clevedon iron district presented a striking contrast to the districts in Scotland to which he had been referring. In the Clevedon district the men were prosperous, no strikes occurred, and all trade disputes were settled by masters and men meeting round the same council table, and calling in an independent umpire to decide between them. There, however, the ironmasters were prejudiced by the violation of the Truck Acts, practised by their Scotch competitors. He would show the House a specimen of a sort of truck note issued to a workman for a sum of about 9s. It bore date May 17, it became due on the 9th of July, and the workman was to take it to a certain store where its value was to be given him in goods. The store was either the property of the employer, or there was collusion between him and the storekeeper, and an allowance was made to the employer in respect of the commodities supplied, which practically amounted to a deduction from the workman’s wages. The system also prevailed in Glamorganshire; and letters in the country papers and in The Mining Journal complained of a like system prevailing in that part of South Wales. Nor was the system confined to Scotland and Wales. A Factory Inspector had informed him that a like mode prevailed at Ringwood, where articles were served to the workmen at a high rate. Since this Notice had appeared in the Paper he had received a letter from one of the secretaries of trades unions in North Nottinghamshire, stating that there were 20 masters in that district who paid the frameworkers on the truck system, and they charged beyond the market value, and the workmen were obliged to sell a portion of the goods obtained on truck in order to buy coals and pay for their children's schooling, and other expenses. If a man there was a member of a co-operative store he was punished. He hoped that the House would not permit such a system to be continued. The workmen in some cases had clubbed their money to prosecute; but what was a fine of £5 to one of these masters. To get one of them fined £5 had actually cost the working men £15. The fine was soon made up, the system went on again, and the man who had dared to inform against his employer was victimized. There was no use in inflicting a fine of £5, £20, or even £100. The Board of Arbitration with which he was connected had advertised in the Nottingham papers that they would assist in putting down this system, and within the last six months a sub-contractor was prosecuted. He was told if he acknowledged his fault, and promised not to transgress again, he would be forgiven. The man sat silent for awhile, and then said—"I will make no promise; you may fine me," and he was fined. But these people cared nothing for a fine. The working man of whom he had spoken said that nothing would do to put down this system except imprisonment. It might be said—"Oh, try moral influence." Let them try the moral influence of the chaplain of the gaol for a fortnight, and his impression was, that they would soon get rid of this contemptible system. How could they hope to inspire working men with respect for the law when they saw magistrates, deputy-lieutenants, and Members of Parliament engaged in such practices? If they were to put an end to this system those who administered the law must themselves be pure. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would grant the inquiry, and that it would not be said in this country that

"Offence with guilty hand can shove by justice."

The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Motion.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER seconded the Motion. He bore witness to the urgent necessity which existed for some legislative Act being passed with regard to the truck system. It was hardly possible to conceive a system more abominably iniquitous than that under which the master advanced to his men their own money at 5 per cent per month, and that not as a right, but as a favour. The facts that had been brought out by the commission to which his hon. Friend had referred were such that he felt convinced it was absolutely necessary some inquiry should be made. It was scarcely possible to imagine a system more demoralizing. All independence was crushed out of a man when he knew that his earnings were not his own. The 3rd section of the Acts prescribed that the entire amount of wages earned by the artificer should be paid him in the current coin of the realm, and that every payment made by the delivery of goods was illegal. But the Acts were evaded. A man was paid in coin on one side of the street, and then he was compelled to go to a store on the other side and to hand in the whole of his wages. It was not merely that the man had to buy what he wanted in the store, but the whole of his wages were swept by the storekeeper into the till, and the man received a line, which he was unable to decline, for goods which were often of very inferior quality. The encouragement to drink under this system was lamentable. It might be urged that anything which might be done to check the system would be an interference with the liberty of the subject as far as the master was concerned. It might be so; but was not the system itself an interference with the liberty of the subject, by the man who was strong over the man who was weak? It was a curious fact that, though the statements with regard to this system had been in circulation for many months, they had not received a single contradiction. He acknowledged it might be difficult to apply a remedy; but he believed weekly payments would go far to supply one. He was afraid there was very little chance of the Mines Regulation Bill passing into law this Session; and, therefore, the Amendment providing for weekly payments, if it found favour with the House, as he was sanguine it might, could not come into operation this year. Under these circumstances, he ventured to urge on the Government that they should sanction the inquiry which was asked for, and which ought always to be granted when an allegation was made that Acts of Parliament had been violated.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, public representations having been made to the effect that systematic evasion of the Truck Acts prevails extensively in the Coal and Iron mining industries in Scotland, as well as in other trades and places in the United Kingdom, this House humbly prays Her Majesty to appoint a Commission of Inquiry into such alleged offences, and to take such steps as She shall be advised for obtaining from Parliament any special powers that may be required for conducting such inquiry or for suppressing such offences."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. ANDERSON said, that in addition to the systems of truck which had been referred to, there was still one other system resorted to of a still more insidious character. It was that the employer built upon the ground on which the works stood, or contiguous, a store, which he let to some person with whom he had no apparent connection. The employer's name was not over the store, nor did he in any way manage the buying or selling which went on there. But he received a half-yearly rent of so magnificent a character that it, in fact, amounted to a profit upon the business; and that system was much more difficult than any other to put down by legislative enactments. There were, he was sure, many respectable employers who would be glad to have the truck system repressed; but, on the other hand, he believed that inquiry would show many not to be so innocent as they now seemed. If Royal Commissioners were sent down to make local examinations, and had power to examine witnesses on oath and to call for books and papers, facts would be elicited which former inquiries had not brought to light. The remedy which he suggested was weekly pay; but it must be not a mere advance, but a weekly balancing of the accounts between employers and employed; and although such a plan would cause much more trouble to the former, who would be sure to oppose such a proposition, it would not be a greater interference with the liberty of the subject than much of the legislation of the past 30 years. He cordially supported the Motion.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, the case for an inquiry did not rest merely upon the statements which had been made to the House; for there were, in addition, the investigations which had been made by private individuals, the results of which had been published in newspapers. The abuses which had been complained of were confined to certain branches of trade; and, when hon. Members considered the origin and the rapid growth of those trades in which they principally existed, and the large numbers of persons who were brought together in certain districts, it might be found that the workmen themselves were the first to instigate the system for their own convenience. At the present day, however, such were the facilities of trade that the wants of workmen could be easily supplied, and the time had arrived when employers ought to consider whether it would not be to their interest to abolish the truck system, with a view to establishing a better understanding than now existed between themselves and those whom they employed. He doubted whether the evil was so widely spread as had been represented, for if it was he wondered that such abuses could have arisen without meeting with resistance from workmen, who, according to the statements which had been made, would seem to be mere serfs and bondsmen. They had, however, entered into combinations to control the rate of wages, and in the West of Scotland almost every newspaper contained some report of meetings of thousands of workmen, who passed resolutions in the open day; and it was, therefore, impossible to deny that a spirit of independence prevailed among those workmen, which might be brought to bear upon the abuses of which there was probably some reason to complain. Another reason why an inquiry should be instituted was that it might lead to some practical suggestion whereby the abuses might be remedied, because no former inquiry had resulted in anything that was worthy the consideration of the House. He did not deprecate inquiry, but wished to point out that the difficulties of the case were so great that the House might feel some difficulty in coping with them; and he looked to the growth of intelligence and independence among the working men rather than to legislation.

Mr. BRUCE said, it was impossible to have listened to the very able speech of his hon. Friend who had introduced this subject without perceiving that a great evil existed, and he feared that it was of such a character that some time would elapse before the Legislature could extirpate it. The truck system had long occupied the attention of Parliament. He had himself taken part in several inquiries into the subject, and was most anxious to meet the wishes of his Friend and to satisfy the yearnings of the working people that so iniquitous a system should be put an end to. But although the Government would give every facility for an inquiry, he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) that the only effectual remedy was rather a moral than a legal one, and must arise from a sense on the part of employers of their duties towards their workmen. He had frequently had occasion to consider the Truck Acts, and it certainly appeared to him to have been framed with remarkable skill. Indeed, he could hardly conceive how, if cases were brought before the magistrates, the Acts could be successfully evaded by methods like those described by his hon. Friend. The systems of payment which his hon. Friend mentioned were perfectly familiar to those who had inquired into the subject during the last 20 years. Nearly 20 years had elapsed since Mr. Tremenhoe and Mr. Hill Burton inquired into the operation of the truck system in England and Scotland, and their description of its evils were as graphic as any which had been given in the present debate. The difficulty of finding a remedy was caused not so much by the defects of the present law as by the absence of combination and energy on the part of the working men themselves in applying it. As an illustration of this he would mention a case which occurred in a part of Wales where the truck system once flourished, and he might, in passing, remark that the truck system was gradually disappearing in Wales, instead of increasing, as had been asserted in the course of the present debate. Forty summonses were taken out against an ironmaster for carrying on the truck system, and it was proved that money was paid to the men on condition of its being taken to a certain store to be spent. There was no visible connection between the ironmaster and the keeper of the store; but nevertheless the magistrates were satisfied that the defence set up was merely a colourable one, and they accordingly convicted the ironmaster. The remaining 39 prosecutions were dropped. In a short time the system flourished with as much vigour as ever, and yet, strange to say, no fresh attempt was made to enforce the Acts. He believed, however, that other convictions might have been made if prosecutions had been instituted. On the occasion to which he had just referred the decision of the magistrates was questioned, and an action brought by the employer for the price of the goods supplied to the workmen; but the County Court Judge who tried the case, held that the goods had been supplied in defiance of the Truck Acts, and that the employer was not entitled to recover. He was really at a loss to understand why the working people had been so deficient in energy and combination. If they had displayed half the vigour and determination to put down this system as they had done with regard to the number of bricks to be carried and the stone to be cut in a quarry, and in promoting other favourite schemes of theirs, the evil could not have existed up to the present time. His hon. Friend had asserted that the evil was very widespread, and that it was increasing both in intensity and in the area it occupied. He might remark, however, that the statements made this evening were precisely similar to those which led to the inquiry some 20 years ago. It was then asserted as now, that almost the whole of the wages of the men passed through the stores, and that the real remedy for the evil was to insist on short payments.

Mr. MUNDELLA remarked that he did not say the evil was increasing in England. He only said it was increasing in Scotland.

Mr. BRUCE said, it certainly was not increasing in England or in Wales. The present statements being precisely similar to those made 20 years ago, he wished to draw the attention of the House to some of the results of Mr. Tremenhoe's inquiry. That gentleman found that in a district where the truck system most extensively prevailed, out of £152,000 due for wages, only £26,000 went through the stores; and, with regard to another district, he ascertained that, out of £250,000 paid in wages, only £30,000 passed through the stores. He had read the statement made by the Commissioners in The Glasgow Daily Mail on the subject of the system in Scotland, and he should be very glad to furnish means of testing the accuracy of those statements. At the same time, he thought the experience of former times ought to induce hon. Members to suspend their judgment until it was clearly proved that the evil was really as great as had been described. The Committee of 1854 took into consideration the Bill which had been introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall (Mr. C. Forster), who devised two methods for improving the existing legislation, neither of which were adopted. His hon. Friend first of all proposed that no shop should ever be opened on the premises of an employer of labour; but that was deemed too stringent a provision. The other remedy proposed was that the mere fact of an employer having sold goods to a labourer should be regarded as an offence against the law, without any inquiry being made as to whether the goods were received in lieu of wages or not. This was also thought too severe. The only remedy which had not yet been tried, and which, in his judgment, might to a certain extent prove efficacious, was to increase the penalties for breaking the law. He freely admitted that an evil existed, and that a remedy ought, if possible, to be applied. Her Majesty's Government were quite willing to enable his hon. Friend to attain the object he had in view; and they would, therefore, not object to adopt his Resolution, with some slight alteration. He hoped that, instead of asking for the appointment of a Royal Commission, his hon. Friend would withdraw his Resolution on the understanding that the Government would carry on the inquiry in the manner most calculated to produce the desired result; or, if he would move an Address to Her Majesty to cause the inquiry to be so carried on as to produce such a result, the Government would offer no opposition to the Motion. In conclusion, he might remark that Her Majesty's Government were most anxious to put a stop to this truck system, which was so pernicious to the working classes.

Mr. C. DALRYMPLE said, he could not help fearing, from what they had just heard from the right hon. Gentleman, that, as far as the Government was concerned, nothing would be done in the matter during the present Session or the approaching Recess. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was evidently impressed by what the hon. Baronet the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had said, who undoubtedly spoke with a weight which commanded the attention of the House. It must be remembered, however, that the chief evils complained of were to be found in the county which the hon. Gentleman represented, and he naturally would desire to give the most favourable account of them. The coulour de rose view of the question taken by the hon. Baronet would not, however, satisfy him (Mr. C. Dalrymple). It was not in Scotland that these evils exclusively existed. During the Easter Recess, in company with an hon. Friend opposite, he had had the opportunity of judging of the so-called evasions of the Truck Acts in what was called the Black Country, and he could testify to the fact that they were systematically carried on there. After quoting from the Report of the Commissioners of the North British Daily Mail, it might be said—How could the people object to such a system when they did not themselves complain of it? Now he was informed upon good authority that there was a good deal of terrorism existing in reference to this subject in the districts where the system was practised, and that consequently the working men had not really the power of appealing against it. There was no doubt that the system did not work to the advantage of the workmen, because the owners of those shops obtained enormous profits, and gave the people very inferior articles. Those who had preceded him had dwelt so fully upon the mischievous effects of the truck system, that it was scarcely necessary to enlarge upon the aggravated evil of having liquor stores close to the places of labour, where gin and whiskey were sold to the men, who were obliged to drink in order to get their money's worth. He did not exaggerate—he could be corrected if he did—when he said that matters were so arranged that in order to get the value of their money the men were forced to drink at the store, else they would never even handle the money which had been earned by the sweat of their brows. Long payments of wages had much to answer for in this matter, because they necessarily occasioned the credit system with all its consequences. In the Black Country the system of weekly payments was practised, but he thought that daily payments, such as had been tried in some of the best of the Scotch ironworks, the Messrs. Baird's especially, might be adopted with the most beneficial results. Although he was afraid the Government would not take any action in the matter in the present Session, he hoped that the debate which had taken place would lead, in no long time, to the complete disclosure and to the ultimate removal of the evils of the truck system.

MR. J. G. C. HAMILTON trusted that the inference drawn by the hon. Member who had just sat down from the statement of the Secretary of State was not a correct one, and that the Government would move in this matter without much delay. It would, in his opinion, be a great benefit to the country if this stigma were removed from the character of the employers who were charged with practising this disgraceful system. Although he lived in a district in which this evil existed, and was an employer of labour, he had heard very little about the truck system until about three or four years ago.

MR. LIDDELL said, he had never heard a case of the evasion of the Truck Acts in the district which he represented; but if there were evasions in other parts of the country, he should like to see an inquiry instituted. There was nothing more iniquitous in practice than the systematic evasion of these Acts. He thought that the evasions of the Truck Acts in Scotland were more of an indirect than of a direct character, but opportunities ought to be given for adducing evidence, if any could be brought forward. The object of any inquiry ought to be to furnish ground for legislation; but in the absence of that evidence, he hoped the House would not hastily seek to apply a remedy.

MR. WHALLEY remarked, that whatever was done, he hoped the Home Secretary would not employ Commissioners to go about the country, who would be likely to employ themselves in collecting evidence to support a foregone conclusion. As a rule, there was no injury whatever in the truck system that the workmen were not able to rectify for themselves. It was not the workmen who objected to these practices, it was simply the family of small shopkeepers, who, with a design to further their own interest, sought to excite a feeling of dissatisfaction between the masters and the workmen. Where this system prevailed the workmen found benefit in other ways. He trusted that the Home Secretary would not allow himself to be influenced by arguments which applied only to one side of the question.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, that much disappointment was felt in Scotland at the fact that, after the promise made by the Government on a former occasion, no proceedings had been taken by the Lord Advocate and the Government with the view of putting an end to a system so generally and so justly condemned. He believed that a strict enforcement of the existing law would go far to prevent an evasion of the Truck Acts. In the part of the country which he had the honour to represent there was no truck, and a daily advance of wages without poundage was the general rule. He hoped the Government would accede to the proposal of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) and have a rigid inquiry instituted.

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said he accepted the offer of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, on the understanding that the inquiry would be conducted in such a manner as would make it effectual. His desire was that the facts should be fully and fairly brought out. His own impression was that it would be impossible by moral remedies to meet the difficulty. He was surprised to hear the Home Secretary say that if the men would combine effectually they could get rid of the truck system, and it was strange that men should be advised to enter into combinations and to adopt all the requirements of strikes in order to enforce the law.

MR. BRUCE begged his hon. Friend's pardon. He had said nothing about combining to strike. What he had referred to was combination to prosecute.

MR. MUNDELLA remarked that he had seen this tried again and again, and the result was that by spending £15 or £20 they might succeed in inflicting a £5 penalty; but so long as the gains were so large and the risk so small, all that the workmen could do would not be sufficient to enforce the observance of the law. What he desired was such an inquiry as would show the collusion which existed between the storekeeper and the employer, and he should be very glad if there were power to examine upon oath and to call for books and papers, for the parties, since exposure had taken place, were buying and selling in other names.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PUBLIC SERVICE—(COMPETITION).

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN, in rising to move for Copies of any Treasury Minute that may have been passed on the subject of first appointments to the subordinate offices in the Public Service by unrestricted competition; and, of any Correspondence that may have taken place thereon between the Treasury and the Heads of the other Departments, said, that he was informed that the Government did not intend to assent to the Motion, and, therefore, he hoped that he might be allowed to make a short explanation of the reasons for asking for these Papers. Very early in the Session the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) moved a Resolution in favour of unrestricted competition, but withdrew it upon an assurance from the head of the Government that the subject was under consideration, and that it was hoped that soon a plan for unrestricted competition would be adopted. In February the Home Secretary, when asked for the Papers, had said that he would give the House the best information when the correspondence was in a more advanced state. On the 4th of June an Order in Council was issued, which partially established the system of unrestricted competition for appointments in the public service. It might be said, therefore, that it was now too late to ask for a correspondence on the subject. He did not think so; because the House had a right to be informed of the proceedings of the different Departments of the Government in relation to a matter of this kind. The change which had been adopted by the Government in that matter was more nominal than real. On the 4th of June an Order in Council was passed, by which situations in the public service after the 31st of August next were to be given by unrestricted competition with certain exceptions. Schedule

A of the Order in Council contained all the offices which were to be open to unrestricted competition, and Schedule B contained all those excepted from its operation. The 7th section of the Order in Council was to this effect—

“In case the chief of a department to which a situation belongs and the Lords of the Treasury shall consider that the qualifications in respect of knowledge and ability deemed requisite for such situation are wholly or in part professional, or otherwise peculiar, and not ordinarily to be acquired in the Civil Service, and the said chief of the department shall propose to appoint thereto a person who has acquired such qualifications in other pursuits, or in case the said chief of the department and the Lords of the Treasury shall consider that, either for the purpose of facilitating transfers from the Redundant List, or for other reasons, it would be for the public interest that examination should be wholly or partially dispensed with, the Civil Service Commissioners may dispense with examination, wholly or partially, and may grant their certificate of qualification upon evidence satisfactory to them that the said person possesses the requisite knowledge and ability, and is duly qualified in respect of age, health, and character.”

That section gave such large powers to the heads of Departments and the Lords of the Treasury that in conjunction they could appoint anyone to an office in Schedule A without any examination whatever. Nor was that all; for by section 8 of the same Order in Council power was reserved to the chiefs of Departments, with the concurrence of the Lords of the Treasury, to add situations to or withdraw situations from either of the Schedules A and B, so that they might undo all that had been done by the Order in Council. The hon. Member for Brighton had dwelt upon the evil effects of giving situations in the public service upon the recommendation of Members of that House; but another species of patronage of a not less prejudicial character would still be left in full force—namely, the appointments which might be made under the 7th section of the Order in Council that he had quoted, and which the Government might confer on their friends. There were two kinds of strength possessed by Governments. The first was that which they derived from possessing the confidence of the country, and which enabled them to carry out great measures that were understood and resolved upon by the country. The other was that which they had heretofore derived from official patronage—a very mischievous source of support, as he conceived, and one which he desired to see rapidly diminished, and ultimately extinguished. When the House was told not many days since that its Address, if carried, was not worth more than the paper it was written upon, it would do well to inquire whether the power of the Government had not increased, was not increasing, and ought not to be diminished. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, Copies of any Treasury Minute that may have been passed on the subject of first appointments to the subordinate offices in the Public Service by unrestricted competition :

"And, of any Correspondence that may have taken place thereon between the Treasury and the Heads of the other Departments."—(Mr. Sinclair Aytoun.)

MR. STANSFELD regretted to find that his hon. Friend was of opinion that the Order in Council on the subject of open competition was not worth the paper on which it was written. He doubted very much whether the House would agree with his hon. Friend in that opinion. As far as he could judge, he believed that the House, on the contrary, had shown an appreciation of that Order in Council and of the motives which influenced the Government in putting it before the public. The views of the Government were stated to the House by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, and the House was able to judge of those views and also of the sincerity of the Government in endeavouring to carry them out; and he ventured to think that Order in Council showed very considerable and reliable evidence of the sincere opinions of the Government in favour of the principle of open competition, and their desire to apply it as far as practicable. His right hon. Friend, in answering a Question put some time ago on the subject, stated that the correspondence which had passed between the Treasury and the other public Departments had been of a confidential nature; and the House would understand that if it had not been of a confidential nature, its very object probably would have failed. The Government approved the principle of open competition; but the method of bringing about its acceptance and adoption which they pursued was to invite a confidential expression of the opinions of the various heads of Departments, and under those circumstances it was impossible for them to produce the correspondence, which had been invited in confidence. The result, however, of the correspondence was before the public in the shape of the Order in Council to which his hon. Friend had referred. He would not now occupy the time of the House in discussing the Order in Council, which, however, the Government would be ready to discuss whenever his hon. Friend called the attention of the House specifically to it. The present Motion asked for the production of the Treasury Minute; but there was no Treasury Minute to produce. There was a Treasury Circular addressed to the various heads of Departments, asking them to enter into confidential communication, as he had stated, with the Treasury as to the method in and the degree to which the principle of open competition could be applied.

MR. FAWCETT said, that having originally brought forward that question, he could not but feel extremely pleased that the Government had gone as far as they had done in the matter. He could only wish that their scheme had been somewhat more complete. It certainly seemed to him—and perhaps they would be able to judge better after they had had more experience—that too great a power had been reserved to the heads of Departments in regard to appointments in the Civil Service without examination. He must say that of the two he preferred the modern system of competition. What he objected to in the scheme was that officers in the Foreign and Home Departments were excepted from the Order in Council.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, they had consulted every head of a Department on the subject, taken his opinion, and acted upon it. The heads of the Home Office and of the Foreign Office thought it would be better the system should not be extended to them. To that they saw no objection, because the great mass of the Civil Service were willing to come in. The matter was in the nature of an experiment, and they felt that if the proceeding were to succeed, it was better it should do so with the consent of all concerned than to force it violently on unwilling persons, who were responsible for the conduct of the Departments, merely because his right hon. Friend and himself happened to be entirely in favour of it. The thing would be very shortly tested, and then it would be seen whether it could be safely extended. The House would observe that the 7th section only extended the system to first appointments. They did not maintain that promotion after the first appointments, or to what were called Staff appointments should be dependent on competition. He was certain that nothing was so likely to injure the plan as to attempt to force matters. They could not decide in every case by competition who were best fitted for a particular service. When they came to select persons of particular qualification—lawyers, for example—the best way to do so would not be by competition. A much better way would be to look about for persons who had proved themselves to be able lawyers and to take them. Competition, after all afforded but an erring standard. It was only the best expedient among many. If heads of Departments were free from all possible influences, and could give their minds wholly to see who were the fittest persons, they might do better than by examination; but being frail they might be mistaken, and, therefore, it was thought better to introduce the competitive system. But that did not apply to Staff appointments. As to the 8th section, much the same might be said. It was quite possible mistakes might be made in the first instance, and that officers might be put under competition which it would be better to withdraw. Of course, whether the thing would be thought to work well or not would depend not upon the heads of Departments or the Treasury, but upon the public opinion of the country, and if public opinion ratified the experiment it would be perfectly impossible for anyone to enforce this section in such a way as to throw the system back. He hoped, therefore, the House would believe that the hon. Gentleman, he was sure most unwittingly, had exaggerated the matter when he said that these clauses were so great a dereliction from principle that they would entirely defeat the object in view.

Mr. SINCLAIR AYTOUN wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary why he was opposed to the principle of open competition? However, as the right hon. Gentleman was not in his place, he would put the question another day. He must say that the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had only confirmed him in his suspicions.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION (ENGLAND AND IRELAND).

RESOLUTION.

Mr. PIM, in rising to call attention to the unsatisfactory state of the Telegraphic communication between England and Ireland, and especially between London and Dublin; and to move a Resolution, said, that great dissatisfaction on this subject prevailed in Ireland, and referred to meetings which had been held in Dublin to give expression to that feeling. Dublin was the only place in the United Kingdom, except London, which had an independent Stock Exchange, at which the public funds were registered and transferred; and it was of very great importance that there should be perfect telegraphic communication between the two places, so that the price of the funds in both might be identical. Formerly, the telegraphic communication between London and Dublin was almost instantaneous, and brokers in Dublin were in the habit of getting business transacted in London for their clients, which they could do by means of the telegraph, on the same day. But since the telegraphs had come into the hands of the Government there had been such delays that business of that kind could not be transacted with certainty, and the brokers lost their profits. The members of the Dublin Stock Exchange were much dissatisfied with this, and they had forwarded to him (Mr. Pim) a copy of a resolution adopted at a meeting of their body, in which they said they could no longer refrain from expressing their strong disapprobation of the utterly inefficient manner in which the telegraphic communication between England and Ireland had been carried on since the transfer of the telegraphs to the Government. Several cases of very unusual delay had been reported to him, as, for instance, a message sent from Dublin to Liverpool at 12 o'clock on the 20th of June, but which was not delivered till the morning of the 21st. It had long been the practice for the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company to send messages from Dublin to Holyhead, stating the number of passengers who were crossing in the steam boats, in order that the requisite number of carriages might be prepared for them in the train at Holyhead. But since the telegraphic service had been in the hands of the Government, the superintendent of the Holyhead station said the messages were of no use, for they seldom arrived in less than six hours, whereas the boats accomplished the voyage in four. He had never known in Dublin so strong a feeling of disappointment, and annoyance as on this matter, and he had, therefore, thought it his duty to call the attention of the House to the subject. It was said in Dublin that all this was done on purpose to disgust the Irish people with the idea of Government management not only in the matter of the telegraphs, but still more with reference to the railways, the purchase of which had been so strongly pressed on the Government by many people in Ireland. There were only two telegraphic cables between Great Britain and Ireland, containing altogether 11 wires. Both these had lately been out of order, though not both at the same time. He understood that it was proposed to lay down another cable, containing seven wires, between Liverpool and Howth, so that there would then be 18; but he asked if that was enough, considering that the telegraph to America went from Ireland. This was a grievance that ought to be immediately redressed—it was a question deeply interesting, not only to the Irish people, but to the people of Great Britain, and the Government ought at once to take it in hand. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. CRAWFORD, in seconding the Motion, said, he had received many representations from his constituents as to the present imperfect state of telegraphic communication, especially with Ireland, and assured the Postmaster General that there was a feeling on the part of the community that this communication was not what they had a right to expect. With every wish to make allowance for the difficulties of the Department, he hoped some improvement would soon be made in the service. The real reason for the bad service was probably that the Post Office was trying to carry on an extended service at too low rates, and that the rates should have been lowered more gradually. In his own experience he sent a message to Liverpool at 11 in the forenoon, and he did not get an answer till half-past 3 in the afternoon, and on the same day he received at 3 a message from Bombay which had left at 4 on that afternoon. Of course, the difference in latitude made the difference in time; but it was monstrous that so long a time should be consumed between London and Liverpool. There were minor reasons why the delivery in London was not so satisfactory now as it formerly was. The boys in the service of the companies used to be sent out with messages one by one as they arrived, and each boy received 1*d.* for each message he delivered. In this way, the boys were interested in the prompt delivery of the messages, and they earned their pennies as quickly as possible and returned to the offices in the hope of earning others. But now not only was the system altered and the stimulating penny withheld, but the boys were kept at the offices until they could be sent out with several messages at a time. Again, each company had its own offices, and there were four in Mincing Lane; now the offices were consolidated, and sometimes there were so many people at one office waiting to give in messages that the crush was like that at the door of a theatre on a benefit night. These were two sources of dissatisfaction which might be remedied by a little more liberality of expenditure.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it is of great importance to maintain uninterrupted Telegraphic Communication between Great Britain and Ireland; and, therefore, inasmuch as Submarine Telegraphic Wires are very liable to accident, and cannot be repaired as readily as those on land, it is necessary, in order to guard against interruption and delay, to lay down additional Submarine Cables sufficient to maintain the communication unimpaired under all circumstances which can reasonably be anticipated.”—(Mr. Pim.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON admitted the importance of the subject, and said it was quite unnecessary for the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim) to tell him that it had created great excitement in that city. With respect to the meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of Dublin, the proceedings thereat were characteristic of the country, for care was taken to pass the general resolution which had been read before the meeting had heard the explanations of the gentlemen deputed to represent the Department, and some of the speakers exhibited a very considerable turn for that which had been called on the other side of the House one of the principal ornaments of debate—namely, a considerable knowledge of invective. One of them spoke of the impudent Postmaster General humbugging them, and said they did not want his law, but justice; and the only foundation for these remarks was this—that when he was asked a question as to legal liability, he expressed an opinion which was not exactly in accordance with that of the hon. Member who put it, advising the hon. Member not to take his word for it but to consult a lawyer. He was willing to admit that since the transfer of the telegraphs to the Government there had been constant, though not daily delays, which were much to be regretted; and one of the causes of them was the enormous and unexpected increase in the number of messages. Of course, it was always expected that there would be a great increase; but it was not anticipated that it would be so sudden as it had been. To show the increase, he might state that in the six working days previous to the transfer 4,791 messages were sent from Ireland to England. In six working days of April, two months after the transfer, when it was known that one of the two cables was broken, the number of messages was 12,375, being an advance in the daily average from 798 to 2,062. It was obvious that such an enormous increase of work would have overtaxed the Department under any circumstances; but the communication between England and Ireland had been interfered with twice since the transfer by the breaking of the Wexford Cable, which threw all the work on the remaining cable. But this occurred five times under the companies, who, on one occasion, took six weeks to repair the cable, while the Government had always effected the repair in five or ten days. When these breakages occurred the Department exhibited conspicuously in the offices notices printed in large type, warning persons not to send any but the most urgent messages; but these notices had not the slightest effect, the senders stating that the difficulty was not their business, and that the Department must send the messages as it best could. Under these circumstances, it was not to be wondered at that stoppages had occasionally occurred; but it was not true that these delays had been owing to the neglect of remonstrances made by Members of Parliament. On the contrary, the Department had done all in its power to remedy what was complained of. It had greatly improved the transmitting powers of the wires between London and Ireland by attaching improved instruments to them; it had also sent a large number of improved instruments to Ireland; and in all this there was no more delay than was inseparable from the manufacture of the instruments, the supply of which would be continued as long as it appeared to be necessary. With respect to the insufficiency of the cables, he had great pleasure in stating that tenders had been advertised for and received, and in a few days he should be in a position to ask the Treasury to sanction a contract for a new cable. It would have been of no use to have done this earlier, because the Department had had to provide for an enormous increase of work not only between England and Ireland, but throughout the whole United Kingdom, and it was not in possession of sufficient materials, stores, and skilled labour to do all that was wanted. It would have been of no use to lay down a cable of seven wires until additional land wires were laid down between the large towns, and the latter provision having now been made, a new cable could be turned to good account. An enormous amount of business had been thrown on the Department, and it would be admitted that it was impossible for it to undertake not only the ordinary business, but also extensions of the serious character which were suggested at the very first moment of the commencement of its duties. With regard to the memorial referred to by the hon. Member for the City of London, he frankly admitted that very great delay had constantly occurred in the transmission of messages between England and Ireland, but many of the representations on the subject were greatly exaggerated. In some instances, he believed, there had been a delay of three or four hours; but, on the whole, it had been found that in respect of messages sent before 12 o'clock the average delay was 45 minutes, and in respect of messages sent after that hour the average delay was 19 minutes. It should be remembered that many of these messages were sent to most distant towns in Ireland, and had to be retransmitted more than once. So that those delays, though serious, could not be considered to justify the very strong language which had been used with regard to them. His hon. Friend appeared to think that the delay was owing to undue economy, with the view of making the telegraphic service pay. Though, of course, it was a great object of the Department to present a good balance-sheet, still that desire had not hitherto presented obstacles to the rapid transmission of messages. So far from discharging competent clerks, as was generally supposed to be the case, the Department had omitted no effort not only to keep every efficient man and woman in its employment, but also to attract to the service efficient clerks, who had previously left it, and in London and at various provincial stations, and at Dublin, where schools were established for instruction in telegraphy, was using the best means to increase the staff at its disposal. The staff which the Department found in the employment of the telegraphic companies consisted of 2,418 clerks, and upwards of 1,400 messengers; but at the present moment the Department employed 2,935 clerks and 2,280 messengers, and those numbers did not include a large number of postmasters in the country, who were competent to undertake the duty of transmitting telegraphic messages. It was, however, admitted that the staff was not sufficient, and every effort was being made to secure a number of employés equal to the wants of the service. In reference to the complaint respecting the diminution in the number of offices, he would observe that in one or two instances the Department had consolidated offices because it was found that under the old system, when one company opened an office in any street, another company felt it necessary to open a competing office in the same street; but by the offices being now more widely separated, a greater accommodation was afforded to the public. For some cause the transfer of the telegraphs to the Government had not been satisfactory to the mercantile community, though merchants and the Stock Exchange had very little to complain of, yet he believed the public at large had gained what the mercantile community had lost. The immense increase in the number of messages showed that the service, if not all that could be desired, was a great accommodation and convenience to the public. But the Post Office would not be satisfied with quantity so long as there was a deficiency in quality; and no means would be left untried to obtain efficiency to the same degree as existed previously, or to a still greater degree. If the public would only extend patience to the Department, a very short time would elapse before they would no longer have any reason to complain.

PARTY PROCESSIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. William Johnston, Viscount Crichton, Captain Archdall)

[BILL 26.] COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st June], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Question again proposed.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that on behalf of the Government he was not able to support the measure, and he should, therefore, move that the House go into Committee upon it on that day three months. It would be remembered that on the second reading of the Bill he gave a conditional assent on the part of the Government to that stage of it. But he took the greatest pains to make it understood that he was about to bring in a general Bill on the subject, proposing to deal with processions of all kinds in Ireland. Since then, owing to the pressure of business, considerable delay had occurred in proceeding with that Bill, and as time went on the critical anniversary in July approached, and it had been supposed that his Bill had some special reference to the anniversary in the present July, but that was not the case. He frankly admitted that the expectations he had formed that such a measure would meet with a large amount of assent on both sides of the House had turned out not to be well-founded. The Bill introduced certainly did not find favour with those who desired to repeal the present Act, and he could not say that it found much favour in any part of the House; but, although that became evident soon after the introduction of the Bill, he yet felt bound to give the House ample opportunity of expressing its opinion upon it. He had assented conditionally to the second reading of the Bill now before the House; he had engaged to produce an alternative measure, and he had been most anxious to place it fully and fairly before the House, which he had done a few evenings ago. The result was, that many who had looked with considerable favour on a general law regulating processions so long as it was at a distance, saw it in a different light when it came near at hand; so that the proposal he made met no favour at their hands, and not only was it rejected by the Mover and Seconder of the present Bill, but it was treated very much in the same way by many other hon. Members opposite. That being the case, he felt he had done his duty. It was not a measure which it would be desirable to press forward without a very considerable amount of support from Irish Members, especially at that period of the Session. The Government, therefore, had decided to withdraw their measure. Having said this, he felt perfectly free to deal on its merits with the Bill now before the House, which sought to repeal the only statute dealing with party processions in Ireland. The Government could not consent to the repeal of that Act. They were not prepared, in the present state of Ireland, to leave the subject entirely unregulated and untouched by statute law; they were not prepared in the present condition of Ireland to do that which would appear to be a proclamation on their part that these party processions were harmless and inoffensive, and without danger to the peace and prosperity of Ireland. They were not inclined to deprive the Executive of those powers which the present Act gave, and which had always been and would continue to be used with the utmost toleration and forbearance by the Government of Ireland. At the same time, while exercising the powers given by the present law in that spirit, and prepared to use them if, unfortunately, it should be necessary on any occasion in Ireland, he must say that the Government could not bring themselves to look on a Party Processions Act as a permanent part of the legislation of the country. He earnestly trusted that would not be the case. There were, no doubt, indications in the North of Ireland that pointed both ways. He was not prepared to endorse all those roseate descriptions of the present harmony in the North of Ireland which they sometimes heard from the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston). He knew too well there was much in Ireland at this moment very different from those descriptions, and, although according to the intelligence he had received, this celebrated anniversary had so far passed off tranquilly in Ulster, yet, for all that, the strange—he was going to say the scandalous—spectacle still continued, that Government at this time of day should find it necessary summer after summer to send down a large force of military and police to a flourishing, happy, and prosperous part of the country for the purpose of keeping the peace between the two religious parties there. In some parts of Ulster good influences might be used to prevent any danger on these occasions; but, as he knew, in other parts certainly a different feeling prevailed. There was reason, however, to hope that the spirit of party and religious opposition was dying away, and they need not look forward to this special statute forming a permanent part of the legislation of the country. He would venture to express his hope that all those possessing influence in Ulster would so use it year by year as to make party processions equally unknown and unnecessary. He moved that the House do go into Committee on this Bill that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue,)—instead thereof.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON said, this question had been so well discussed, both on the second reading and on a more recent occasion, that it was needless to spend many words upon it now. Yet, after the expression of opinion given by the House against exceptional legislation, he thought the Government would have acceded to their just request and have allowed them to go into Committee on the Bill. He would feel himself bound to oppose the Motion.

COLONEL STUART KNOX contrasted the statement made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland last year and his utterances that night. Then he said he had no particular liking for the Act which he would not now repeal, and which he described last year as introducing into the hands of a large class a sense of inequality and unfairness. It was understood at that time that a full and impartial inquiry would take place, and a Royal Commission was promised. But nothing had been done, and they were told that Government was determined not to repeal an Act which was a disgrace to the statute book, and which kept the North of Ireland in a state of slavery.

Order for Committee read.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in moving that the Order for going into Committee on the Bill be read and discharged, said, he thought it advisable to take that course, because clauses had been introduced into the Education Bill which superseded the necessity for half of his measure, and it would be requisite to remodel the remaining half as to make it to all intents and purposes a new Bill.

Looking at the advanced period of the Session, he did not suppose he would have much chance of passing such a Bill, and he should, therefore, defer dealing further with the subject until next Session.

PERMISSIVE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR
BILL—[BILL 112.]—SECOND READING.

(*Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Sir Thomas Bazley, Lord
Claud Hamilton, Sir John Hammer, Mr.
Miller, Mr. Dalway, Mr. Macarthy Downing.*)

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he regretted to be obliged to bring this question before the House at so late a period of the Session. The House would remember that at the beginning of the Session they were in expectation of a measure being brought in by the Government for the purpose of dealing with the licensing system. An intimation to that effect was contained in the Speech from the Throne. He had thought it would not be respectful to the Government if he introduced his project for dealing with intemperance when they were in daily expectation of the measure of the Government being brought forward. No such Bill, however, had been introduced. He did not intend to reproach the Secretary of State for the Home Department on that account, because they knew that the promised Bill had been postponed from the force of circumstances. Still, he did not think that was a wise or a good policy. However important the measures the House had had before it, there was none so important as a measure which would tend to reduce drunkenness in this country. They who felt strongly on this subject, and believed that they had in view a substantial remedy for the existing evil, could not take the responsibility of sitting still when they saw what was going on around them. He had therefore brought forward the present Bill. This Bill had only been twice before the House. The first time was in 1864, when he was defeated by a majority of 7 to 1. A new Parliament intervened, in which he had not a seat; but last year, on the assembling of another Parliament under a new state of things, he again introduced the measure, and the result was that he was defeated by only 2 to 1. This showed that the question had made considerable progress among the masses. One reason why he was defeated on the last occasion by such a majority was that hon. Gentlemen naturally looked forward to the measure promised by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce). The same argument might now be used as was used on a former occasion with respect to the passing of a very useful measure; but he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not be led to fight against the Bill to-day, because he might be as thoroughly in earnest as he was last year. It was quite possible that circumstances might again prevent him from bringing forward his measure next year. He hoped, therefore, that whatever might be in the minds of the Government with respect to the mode of dealing with the licensing question, they would not permit it to militate against a full discussion of the merits of the Bill which was before the House. It might be urged, as an argument against proceeding with this Bill, that a great measure of national education was being passed, and that education was the real cure for drunkenness. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department seemed to place much reliance on that cure. He thought that was his right hon. Friend's strong impression; because although he admitted that restrictive measures were, to some extent, necessary, yet he based his main hope of eradicating drunkenness and improving the general morals of the people on a comprehensive system of national education. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was, however, of opinion that some such legislation as he proposed was necessary to effect the object. The New England States were described as being the best educated parts of the world; but he found, nevertheless, that they were there unable to contend with the evils introduced by the liquor traffic, and that it was there that all the attacks on it had been initiated. Now, what, he would ask, was the teaching which was to be given under the present measure of education with the view of putting an end to drunkenness? He was quite sure that nobody proposed that the children should be taught to become teetotallers. Those who were addicted to drunkenness knew perfectly well that they were doing wrong, and that the vice tended to produce their ruin and that of their families; but they were the victims of a habit into which they were led by an appetite they could not control, and to teach them the exercise of self-control was the only education which would be effectual as a remedy. He doubted very much whether mere book-learning would do much in that direction. It was not only the most ignorant persons who were the victims of this vice. In the debate of last year the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), after showing that the beer-shops were not so blameworthy as some supposed, said that—“If he were called upon to name those within his knowledge who had ruined their prospects in life, who had lost good situations, and who had fallen from comparative ease and competence to a state of degradation, they would not be the men belonging to the labouring class following agricultural or mechanical pursuits, but they would be the men of a superior class and of good education, men who had enjoyed comfortable homes and good salaries, and who, in spite of all, had fallen victims to that abominable and frightful vice.”

Again, the Rev. B. de Renzi, chaplain to Leeds Borough Gaol, stated that out of 1,041 prisoners committed in 1852-3, only 138 had never been to school. The Rev. Joseph Kingsmill, in his official Report of Pentonville Penitentiary for 1849, said—

“Of 1,000 convicts 957 had been scholars in the different day schools high and low in the country, and nearly half that number on an average five years.”

Returns sent in in 1849 from the Governors of 100 prisons showed that out of 5,996 prisoners then in gaol 2,900 had been Sunday scholars. At a meeting of ticket-of-leave men, called by H. Mayhew, March 12, 1856, to which 50 responded, it appeared that more than one-half had been educated either at day schools or Sunday schools. In Parkhurst Prison, out of 937 boys confined in 1844, 734 had been at day schools, on an average, nearly four years. Mr. Smith, Governor of Edinburgh Gaol, said, in 1845—“The number of commitments of those who can read well is much greater than the number of those who cannot read at all.” Therefore he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) did not think that any specific for the vice of drunkenness was to be found in any system of national education. They were told that the upper classes had greatly improved within the last generation; but surely the

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

House would not attribute that improvement to the progress among them of elementary education. It was not reading, writing, and arithmetic that prevented the country squire from drinking his three bottles now and falling under the table as in former times; it was rather the influences by which he was surrounded. It should be borne in mind, too, that education had been a long time in operation, but that it had failed to go to the root of the question. The teaching and preaching did not go to the root of the matter, and in the expressive words of the chaplain of the Preston House of Correction—

“The improvement which takes place in the country, with respect to drunkenness, is so slow that it can be measured only at very long intervals of time.”

He had heard Home Secretaries on former occasions quote judicial statistics to show that drunkenness was decreasing; but anyone who referred to the judicial statistics would find in them a convincing proof that the evil of drunkenness in this country was not diminishing, for while in 1866-7 there were 100,375 drunk and disorderly persons proceeded against, in 1867-8 they had increased to 111,465, and last year there was a further increase of over 11,500. That did not look as if things were improving very much. But still more remarkable was it, that even since the Licensing Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Essex (Sir Selwyn Ibbetson) was passed, in all the large towns—the Returns state that in Manchester, Salford, Liverpool, Leeds, Bradford, and Birmingham—there had been an increase in the cases of drunk and disorderly persons charged before the magistrates. He could not account for it, but still it was the fact. In Liverpool the increase in all kinds of offences connected with drink, but exclusive of drinksellers' offences, was not less than 1,726, the Returns for the four months ending January 31st, 1869, being 5,463; while those returned in the four months ending January 31st, 1870, were not less than 7,189. In Manchester he found from the Report of Captain Palin, the head constable, that the number of persons—

“Proceeded against during the year were nearly three times the number they were 10 years ago. In these offences there was a considerable increase; drunkenness, however, showing most prominently. The persons arrested for that offence in 1860 gave

25 per cent of the total persons proceeded against, which had increased to 40 per cent during the past year. There were many other offences arising immediately out of drunkenness which could not be classed under this head. Some idea of that might be gathered from the fact that 65·1 per cent of the persons arrested were drunk when taken into custody. The increased demand upon the time of the police which that offence occasioned materially interrupted that constant attention to their duties which was so necessary for the effectual protection of property and detection of criminals."

He dared say some attempt would be made to controvert these statistics, but he believed that they would be found to be quite correct. Now came the question, what was to be done to remove so great an evil? It was idle, he contended, to expect that it would diminish unless some very decisive step was taken by the Legislature. They could not expect more from religious and moral influences than they had already gained. It appeared to him that if they sat still and did nothing, the same causes would produce exactly the same effect. They might as well sit down on a river bank, and expect that the stream would flow away. The principal cause of drunkenness was the temptation which was put in the way of the people by the present system of licensing public-houses in every part of the country. It was said in a Report on the licensing system from the Board of Inland Revenue, drawn up by Mr. Thring, that the system was introduced partly for police and partly for revenue purposes. If that were so he could only say that in the former direction there had been a total failure, while in the latter it had proved a brilliant success. In a financial point of view they could not have had anything more substantial, as they had raised a sum of £24,000,000 from the various sources of revenue derived from the manufacture and sale of drink of all kinds; but its failure as a police measure was proved by the attempts that were constantly made to amend it. Probably from first to last there had been 300 or 400 Acts of Parliament dealing with this matter, trying to make beneficial what had hitherto proved so injurious. In 1830, they had the Beer Act. They were told that good wholesome beer would carry everything before it. Well, they had tried it for nearly 40 years, and found it to be a hopeless failure. Then, again, in 1860, the Prime Minister introduced the Wine Act, and he stated in the House that he introduced it as a temperance measure. But if it had done no harm, which might be doubted, it had certainly done no good, as was perfectly apparent from the facts which he had laid before the House. It was the fashion now to attribute all the evils of the system to adulteration. Well, perhaps the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass), whom he was glad to see in his place, would have something to say on that subject. He was a great friend of the licensed victuallers, and when presiding at the festival of their asylum last May, he said that he was—"One of the fifth generation of a set of tradesman who, for more than 100 years, had been cultivating with all their hearts the good opinion of the licensed victuallers of the country. Some 15,000 of them were in constant communication with him." They were "the most ancient and most useful body of tradesmen that ever existed in the world, engaged in the production and the distribution of the various beverages, without which, he believed, mankind would become no better than a set of monks."

That was, according to the hon. Member, the effect of the beer barrel. The hon. Member strenuously denied that there was any adulteration; but it might be that the hon. Member was mistaken. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) did not care which way it was; either it was good sound beer which did harm, or else the licensing system failed in obtaining satisfactory dealers. On either theory, then, the case must go against the hon. Member. The other new suggestion was, that they should have some fresh licensing body. He had no objection to that, and he was sure that it would be regarded as a boon by the magistrates, who had to discharge, under great difficulties, a most delicate and onerous duty. He was not certain that any other body of men could have discharged it with more satisfaction to the public at large. An elective body had been tried. They had it in Scotland, while in parts of Ireland they had licences granted by a recorder, who was free from local influences. He did not attack the exercise of this power by the magistrates, and was now proposing no new body at all. He wished it to be understood that this Bill was in no shape or way a licensing Bill. It was an anti-licensing Bill. He did not seek to interfere with the power of the magistrates with respect to inquiry into a man's character before they granted him a licence; but they ought, he contended, to be assisted in the performance of that most difficult part of their duties—namely, the finding out of the wants of the inhabitants of a particular neighbourhood so far as the establishment in it of a public-house was concerned. This Bill would not shut up any public-house in the country, but would leave it entirely to enlightened public opinion to act where sufficiently strong to do so. In a number of cases it would have no effect at all; but in others it might be displeasing to the inhabitants of a district that a public-house should be opened in it, and the Bill would give them the power of giving effect to their views, while the magistrates would be saved from a disagreeable duty. The principle of the Bill had met with the approbation of Convocation, and last year 800,000 people had petitioned in favour of it, while there were only four Petitions, all of which came from Licensed Victuallers' Associations, against it. It was this power which the committee of Convocation declared to have been exercised in many cases with the most beneficial effect; and in the report which they issued on the subject, they strongly recommended that the people should be intrusted generally with such a power. Then, again, they had had a number of Petitions on the same subject this year, though it was quite true that they had not so many as they had last year. The reason of that was obvious. People could not be always petitioning upon any subject. They felt that they had expressed their opinion once, and that opinion was equally strong now as it was last year. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, whose absence they all deplored, in one of the last speeches he had delivered in that House, had also endorsed the principle of the Bill. It was true, the right hon. Gentleman went on to say, the machinery was as bad as it could possibly be. Well, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was now talking of the principle, which was a right and just one; the machinery might be altered in Committee. He was not prejudiced in favour of the machinery, and would willingly consent to any alteration which might tend to make it more effective. He took the best that he could find, and adopted the machinery of the Bill from an excellent Act which had worked extremely well. But all he contended for was the principle which was supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) in his speech. He must, however allude to the objection which that right hon. Gentleman took to the measure, because he thought it right to vote against the Bill simply on account of the machinery. Now, on the second reading of a Bill, it was perfectly clear that it was the principle alone and not the machinery, which was proposed for the purpose of carrying that principle into effect, which ought to guide them in their vote. Some hon. Members did not like the idea of a permissive Bill. He begged to say that the present law was permissive; it gave the magistrates a permissive power over these licences. He proposed to put the power in the hands of the ratepayers. No doubt this would be a local Maine Liquor Law. He did not shrink from the word, and contended that wherever the Maine Law had been enforced, it had been an effectual cure for drunkenness. [Mr. Bass: But you cannot enforce it.] Well, let the experiment be tried. [Mr. Bass: It has been tried, and has failed.] The prohibition of the liquor traffic had never failed to do good when carried out in accordance with the will of the people. While on the permissive part of the question, he might ask what did the Vice President of the Committee of Council say with respect to permissive legislation? While acknowledging that it was not to be advocated as final legislation, he said that he could point to cases to show that it had not seldom succeeded. Well, all they wanted was that the experiment should be tried. If the experiment failed, and if, when public-houses were put down, crime and misery continued as rife as ever, it would be time to revert to the old system; but if, on the contrary, their removal was accompanied by a general rise in the moral, social, and material condition of the people, then it would follow that this, like all other good movements, would become progressive, and, in the end, the removal of public-houses would become general. And why was it objected to because it was permissive? The permissive principle had succeeded in the Museums Act. The application of the Health of Towns Act was permissive; and if you applied this principle to the effort to make people healthy, why not also to the endeavour to make them sober? Again, the establishment of

Free Libraries was a permissive measure; few places had availed themselves of the Act, but great good had resulted therefrom, and nobody was hurt by it. Another permissive measure, the Public-houses Closing Act, was brought in by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) in 1864, and Town Councils were thereby empowered to adopt its provisions at pleasure, and close public-houses within certain specified hours, and empowering the police to visit them in the middle of the night. That Act was adopted in many places, and, so far as he could see, no person was aggrieved by it, or suffered from its operation. He must, therefore, confess that he did not see any force in the cry which had been raised against the Bill on the ground that it was permissive legislation. But there was another objection which had been raised to the measure, which he must confess was a very fair one, that was, that it was an attack upon the rights of inhabitants that ratepayers only were to vote, and that they ought to take the opinion of all the inhabitants before the measure should be put in operation. Nothing would give them greater pleasure than to do so if they could; but there was no machinery for getting at them that they knew of. If there were they would be ready and glad to adopt it. Another objection was, that the measure was an encroachment upon individual liberty; but every Act of Parliament was more or less an encroachment upon individual liberty. They put down gambling houses by statute—why not drinking houses? Then it was objected that the ratepayers only were to vote, while all the inhabitants were interested. Now he was ready to give every inhabitant a vote; but there was no machinery for taking the votes of any but ratepayers. Then it was stated there ought not to be piecemeal legislation. This was stated in a Petition presented by the hon. Member for Walsall (Mr. C. Forster) from the licensed victuallers of that borough—only they spelt the word “peacemeal.” But he did not think any grave objection could be brought to their attempting to proceed by instalments. The licensed victuallers argued that they had invested a considerable amount of money in the trade for public accommodation; but if they were so foolish as to invest capital in an undertaking on the faith that the law of this country would be similar to that of the Medes and Persians, he did not think they were entitled to the consideration of that House. However, he did not object to the Petition; but if their case was really made out, how did the matter stand? The licensing body, the magistrates, were empowered by the public to make a bargain with them, in consequence of which the publicans, in consideration of paying so much money, were privileged to sell drink for one year. The State had a right to decline renewing the bargain. But, whether they were to be compensated or not, surely had nothing whatever to do with the second reading of the Bill. He wanted to know whether a man who built a house with the intention of getting a licence for it, well knowing that the very act of getting a licence would raise the value of that house 50 per cent, was to be compensated when the house returned to its actual value, especially when they knew that the increase in its value to the extent of 50 per cent or so had been made at the expense of the depreciation of the value of property all around it? But only let them clearly know on what ground the demand was made, for until then they could not give it a definite answer. At the same time he would say that any compensation would be cheap which would put a stop to the spending of the hundred millions of money which the country expended annually on intoxicating drinks. He intended to have quoted a list of cases in which the prohibitory principle had been put in force, and the manner in which it had always answered its purpose; but he would leave that to his hon. Friends who would speak after him, and to his noble Friend who would second the Motion, and give his own experience, having seen the benefit of it. His noble Friend the other night attended a large and enthusiastic meeting, at which he stated how of his own knowledge the prohibitory principle had worked, and the strong reasons which induced him to demand it for his fellow-countrymen, having seen the effect of it in different parts of the country in which he lived. The House would allow him to say that the Bill interfered with that of nobody else. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary did not even give them a hint of what sort of a Bill he proposed to introduce next year in regard to that question. No doubt the measure which he would bring in would improve the licensing system; and, in point of fact, any Bill which was brought in must be of benefit. He felt sure of that, without seeing it; because he was convinced that it must go the length of restricting the facilities which now existed for obtaining drink, if he made any change at all. But his measure was not passed yet; nay, it was not even introduced. He only said, in the meantime, at all events, do not thrust the liquor down the throats of the people. He did not mean to say that his Bill was a panacea for all the evils of the country; but he believed that it would do an immense amount of good, with no corresponding amount of injury. But if it did a small portion only of good, surely it was worthy of the consideration of the House. Speaking to his constituents last January, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade said—

“If we could subtract from the ignorance, the poverty, the suffering, the sickness, and the crime which are now witnessed among us, the poverty, the suffering, the sickness, and the crime which are caused by this one single but the most prevalent habit or vice of drinking needlessly, which destroys body and mind, and home and family, do we not all feel that this country would be so changed, and so changed for the better, that it would be almost impossible for us to know it again.”

Now, if this measure only tended in that direction, surely it was not one which the Government, the friends, we hope, of the people, could find it in their hearts to oppose. Surely a great responsibility would rest upon any statesman who, without any plan of his own before the House, simply chose to obstruct others. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce) would not take that course; and if he did, he hoped that the House would support him in a measure which he did not pretend to say would be a perfect cure for drunkenness, but which, at any rate, would give to the people of this country a chance of doing what they believed to be for the advantage of themselves and the welfare of the nation.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON, in seconding the Motion, said, he would appeal to hon. Gentlemen to dismiss from their minds any prejudices which they might have formed on the subject from what was said by the opponents of the measure. He contended that the Bill in no way partook of the spirit of the old sumptuary laws, and that it did not seek unduly to interfere with the liberty of the subject. The object of the measure was simply to allow the inhabitants of the country to have some voice and influence in those arrangements which most materially affected their social and moral welfare, and he could not look upon that as an unreasonable or impracticable object. The widespread feeling which now existed on the subject had been created by the consideration that some legislation upon it was necessary. There was an immense body of evidence to show that the greater part of the crime in this country arose from drunkenness. Past legislation on the subject had been faulty and injudicious, and had been confessed to be so by all the authorities and by many successive Governments; and a great public cry had now gone up to Parliament to induce them to meet some of the evils which had been thus created. From the valuable Report which had been issued on the subject by the Committee of the Lower House of Convocation in the Province of Canterbury it appeared that there were nearly 1,000 parishes in which, under the Act passed by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), the restrictive measures of this Bill were already in operation to a certain degree and were producing beneficial results. He would remind the House that Parliament was not invited to make men moral and sober by statute, but simply to undo its own bad work and remedy the mischief which its own faulty legislation had brought about. In Ireland there was perfect unanimity of feeling upon the subject in almost every class, and among those whose views were of almost every shade. The Roman Catholic clergy denounced the evils of the existing state of things, and countenanced this opposing movement in a manner which was most gratifying to all the supporters of this Bill and most creditable to those clergy themselves, and the same feeling was found in the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the Presbyterian body, in the Wesleyans, and, indeed, in every sect or class of the Irish people, who all joined together as one united Christian body in support of legislation of this character. In Ulster the unanimity in its favour was marvellous. At the meeting of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church the decision was unanimous in favour of the Bill; the Synod of the Reformed Presbyterians had also expressed an opinion in favour of legislation of this kind; and he had received more urgent requests to support this measure than he had received respecting any other measure before the House, including even the Land Bill. After the statement made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department last year, that the most intelligent, industrious, and thriving of the artisans were in favour of such legislation, and after the right hon. Gentleman's further statement that it was the duty of Parliament to aid them in such a matter, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would now go farther, and give the powerful support of the Government to this Bill. In the name of thousands and tens of thousands of heads of families who were deeply impressed with the evils produced by the liquor traffic, he entreated the House to try to mitigate these evils, and respond to the prayers of the Petitions addressed to them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he rose to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time upon this day three months. Something had been said by the hon. Baronet who introduced the Bill (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) as to the number of Petitions which had been presented in its favour; but with an organization such as that of which the promoters of the Bill had command, with branches in every district of the country, it was very easy to get up Petitions to any extent whatever. The real test of the sentiments of the country generally upon the subject was to ascertain what was the actual feeling of the people in the large towns and cities of the kingdom. He begged the House to consider what they were asked to do. He could not see the justice of allowing two-thirds of a meeting called together in some very small room, perhaps, by the mayor of any borough to decide whether what was supposed to be the other third should have a glass of ale or cider. If it was right to shut up public-houses, why was it not sought to shut up the clubs in Pall Mall and the refreshment rooms of the Houses of Parliament? Gentlemen of position could afford to stock their cellars and have their wine or beer whenever they were so disposed. What was right for the people generally was right for Members of Parliament. Let there be fair and just legislation all round, and if a proposal to abolish the refreshment room there would not be listened to, as something too ridiculous, why apply a different principle in the case of working men? Under the Bill, one parish might determine to carry out the provisions of the Act, and the adjoining parish might say "No." It would only be necessary to cross the parish boundary in order to obtain what you wanted; but, in his opinion, the establishment of a Maine Liquor Law would lead to evasion on all hands. There would be such a determination to obtain the prohibited drink as to render their legislation practically of no avail. If the Bill passed, there was a danger, not to say a probability, that the quietest and best-conducted people would refuse to submit to its operation. Then, as to compensation, could it be said that it had been put that day in the way it ought to have been? Would the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) think it right if his own property was dealt with in the way he proposed to deal with that of publicans? If the people promoting this Bill were so anxious to carry out its provisions, they need not enter a public-house. Did the supporters of this Bill never drink a glass of wine or brandy and water? He was, indeed, aware that there were some who said—"Give us not this Bill, but give us the principle, and the Government will settle the details," their object being to get the thin end of the wedge in, with a view of ultimately forcing Parliament to drive the wedge home. Now, he objected to the thin end of the wedge altogether. Not a few of the supporters of the hon. Member (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) were professed Free-traders; but Free-traders had sometimes peculiar notions, and allowed but one kind of free trade to exist. Was it free trade to enable two-thirds of the people of a town to say to the other third—"You shall not have a glass of beer?" If the operation of prohibition were so very satisfactory, as it was represented to be by its advocates, how was it that there was not a rush to those estates in the North, where it was in force, until they became peopled like cities of China and Japan? According to Clauses 8 and 9, the teetotallers could ask the opinion of the voters in a parish or borough once every year, while their opponents would be permitted to do so only once every three years. Was anything so likely to produce and promote almost perpetual agitation and turmoil as this evidently unfair attempt at one-sided legislation? Had nothing been effected by the Act of last year promoted by the hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin - Ibbetson)? And ought it not to have a further and a fair trial? It was idle for the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle to say that no interference with the present licensing system was intended. If this were not such an interference, it was difficult to say what could be. In protesting against an infinitesimal portion of the population setting aside vested rights and ignoring compensation, he hoped he should be supported by the House, and in conclusion he would therefore move that the Bill be read a second time upon that day three months.

MR. O'REILLY DEASE, in seconding the Amendment, said, that the advocates of such measures seemed to think that when they had proved, what no one disputed, the evils of intemperance, they had established the necessity for what was called coercive measures. He thought the clergy had done injustice to their own powers of persuasion in seeking for such measures. He did not believe that people could be made wise, virtuous, or temperate by Act of Parliament. The licensed victuallers of Ireland were remarkable for their intelligence and orderly conduct and enlightened ideas, and they would gladly co-operate in promoting any measure which they considered would conduce to social order in that country. No one was more obnoxious to the licensed victualler than a drunken customer.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

MR. WHALLEY said, it was a mistake to suppose that the Bill proposed any new restrictions in principle. It only enacted that the present mode of restricting the sale of intoxicating liquors, which was by means of the magistrates, should be made more effective and useful. The greatest difficulty with which magistrates had to deal was that imposed upon them by the licensing system, and on that ground he supported the principle of the measure without pledging himself with regard to its details.

MR. KENNAWAY said, with regard to the assertion that men could not be made sober by Act of Parliament, he thought the House was quite ready to recognize the principle that Parliament could do much, and therefore ought to do much, to remove temptations to drunkenness out of the way. They were asked to assent to the second reading of the Bill not because it was a perfect measure, but because it was the only measure which could be proposed to the country; but, in considering the principle and provision of the Bill, they had to ask themselves whether it was wise, practicable, and just, and he came to the conclusion that he could not vote in favour of it. It gave a power of absolute prohibition to a majority of the ratepayers of a district, and, remembering that a majority of ratepayers might be a minority of the whole population, he thought this was too large a power to give, because it was capable of tyrannical abuse. He believed the minority would not submit to such a vote, riots would ensue, ill-feeling would be engendered, and the last state of things would be worse than the first. It might be said that riots did not ensue upon private estates where prohibition was enforced; but they could not argue from the action of a beneficent despotism and predict a like result in the self-government of a free people. In the one case, there was no appeal against the edict, and transgression would be summarily punished; in the other there was hope that renewed agitation and difficulty of conviction would restore the old state of things. He thought they might consider a little more the licensed victuallers' interest. The hon. Baronet professes himself willing to accede to any proposal of compensation which would obviate any injustice that might be done under this Bill to the publican interest. They were asked to agree to the second reading of the Bill in the uncertain hope that something might be done to modify its provisions in Committee; but, in his opinion, it was a very dangerous thing to allow measures to pass such a stage in the hope of their being improved afterwards. They had lately heard much about damages for eviction, and would not licensed victuallers have a claim to compensation if their houses were closed? It was said that the only legal claim was to have a licence for a year; but when capital had been invested under the sanction of the Legislature, and the State had derived an income from that investment, it would not be fair or right to interfere with men's trade, and disestablish them, as it were, without more consideration than the Bill proposed. As to New England, the hon. Baronet declared that the imposition of the prohibitory law on the sale of intoxicating liquors in that country had met with great success. He could only speak with reference to the State of Massachusetts; but the effect of the prohibitory law which was passed there 10 years ago had been brought under his notice during two visits he paid to America. The Prohibitory Liquor Traffic Act, passed about 10 years ago, was allowed for a long time to remain totally in abeyance, and on the occasion of his first visit to America there was an absence of restriction of any sort upon the liquor traffic, and though the law existed, it was entirely unenforced. But within two years "a change came o'er the spirit of the dream," and the majority of the Legislature elected on another platform, determined to enforce the Liquor Traffic Act, and the result was that although the liquor was not sold openly in the streets, yet in the hotels its sale was not interfered with, and of the wholesale dealers liquor was always to be procured. Mr. G. A. Sala writes—

"On one occasion when I asked for it the landlady said—'Oh, we can give you nothing whatever to drink;' but the landlord said—'You can get the stuff on the sly,' and so I found. When you enter you ask how the baby is, upon which you go into a cellar or back yard, and there you have an opportunity of drinking the health of the baby."

Therefore, it was plain that drinking went on, and if not openly, there was plenty to be procured. He had lately been in communication with Gideon Haynes, the governor of a state prison in Boston, Massachusetts, a practical philanthropist, and he said that his gaol has been fuller than before, since the attempted enforcement of the law. Moreover, in offences against the Act juries would not convict any man of good character, and there were, in consequence, 2,000 or 3,000 cases in abeyance. Surely it would be a most impolitic thing that any measure of that kind should be retained on the statute book when it was openly evaded. It was most unfavourable to the morals of the people that laws should be made which could be broken with impunity. It was quite evident, therefore, that in New England the prohibition did not give the effect which was desired, but people could still obtain any drink that they required. When Mr. G. Haynes left Massachusetts six months ago, a Bill was being passed through the Legislature, and had received the sanction of the Lower House, which allowed the open sale of beer, ale, cider, and light wines, as it was felt to be impossible to maintain absolute prohibition. America had undoubtedly preceded us in the struggle against intemperance and ignorance, and in his opinion they were bound to improve upon her experience, and not blindly to follow her example. That was what he trusted they were doing in the matter of education, and what, he trusted, they would do when they came to deal with this matter. But if they could not support this Bill, they were not to be allowed to stand by and do nothing. It was their duty to make more and more strenuous efforts to grapple with what he did not hesitate to say was the most gigantic evil of the present age. The hon. Baronet said that the licensing system had failed everywhere; what they, on the other hand, alleged, was that it never had been fairly tried. Let them see it tried upon the principle of the Home Secretary—namely that the manner in which those houses are conducted should be inquired into and restricted by the law. There would then be far more security for the well-conducted houses. He thought, also, that there should be some power conferred upon the magistrates, or other local authorities, for the purpose of restricting the number of the public-houses in any locality; and then, instead of arraying so formidable an interest against them, they might hope to see the holders of all well-conducted houses on the side of temperance. He thought that he would better serve the cause of temperance by promising a hearty support to any real attempt to deal with this licensing question than his voting in favour of the present Bill.

MR. BRUCE said, he had listened with pleasure to the last speech, which to a great extent embodied his views, and also to the speech of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), which was mild and judicious as compared with his Bill and with the tone of its supporters outside the House. He (Mr. Bruce) quite agreed that the interest felt in this subject, especially among the working classes, was both deep and widespread. That was a reason why they should give the question of limiting and regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors their most serious consideration; but it did not preclude them from deciding whether the mode proposed by the Bill was the wisest or the best that could be adopted. The hon. Baronet had dealt fairly with the Government in reference to their conduct in not introducing a Bill this year, for he admitted that if the Irish Land Bill and the Elementary Education Bill were more important than a Licensing Bill, the Government were justified in pursuing the course they had done; but he argued that a Licensing Bill was more important than an Education Bill—and this might be so if reading and writing were the end and aim of education. But the reason why so much labour had been spent first upon education was, that it was believed education would not only expand the intellectual powers of the people, but would also strengthen their moral powers, and encourage in them habits of prudence and forethought, besides creating for them resources the want of which, perhaps, more than anything else led them into drunkenness. He (Mr. Bruce) did not for a moment suppose that education would be a complete cure for drunkenness; but he nevertheless felt confident that the enlargement of the resources of the people would do more than anything else to keep them from the public-house. He opposed this Bill on the ground that it was an imperfect measure. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) supported it, because in his opinion it would supersede the granting of licences by the magistrates. He (Mr. Bruce), however, could not possibly see how it would have any such effect. Imperfect as the Bill was, however, there would be some excuse for passing it if it were loudly demanded by the country; but such was not the case. He felt bound to say that Parliament was pledged to deal with the whole subject, and the Government was pledged also. He should be glad to pledge himself as strongly as he could to undertake to introduce a measure dealing with the whole subject at the earliest practicable period of next Session. Perhaps the Government were rash in introducing this Session two measures of such magnitude as the Irish Land Bill and the Education Bill; for, to use a railway figure, ordinary trains had been shunted for these two expresses, and many important measures remained to be dealt with next Session. The present Bill would deserve to be seriously considered by anyone introducing a general measure. Since the year 1838 they had had in operation two systems, one destructive of the other—a system of authoritative selection, relating to public-houses, neutralized by a system of free trade, relating to beer-houses. The free-trade system never had a fair trial, but they had got rid of it; and the system of authoritative selection was now administered with more regard to public opinion than had ever been shown previously. They, therefore, had a considerable security against a wanton increase in the number of liquor houses; but he did not say that that security was sufficient; and it might be possible to devise other or further means of restriction. It was a more difficult task to deal with existing public-houses than to prevent the increase of their number. No doubt in many places the number was inordinate. Beer-houses had increased in great numbers, and it would have to be considered how that number could be reduced; for, however beneficial the Act of last Session might have been in reducing the number, it applied only in cases where there had been misconduct, or in cases in which the houses were rated below a certain amount. He thought some measure of restriction for the future must be devised; and it would be a great advantage if effect could be given to the popular will expressed in a guarded and judicious manner, and if, without injury to existing interests, they could secure a gradual reduction in the number of existing public-houses and beer-houses in places where by common consent they were too numerous. As to the suggestion that advantage might be taken of the fact that licences were granted only for a year, it would be to the last degree unjust if they were by one Act to suppress existing public-houses and beer-houses without compensation. In many instances licences had been transferred for large sums of money, even as high as £1,000; and in many cases sums had been expended which could be recouped only by the prosecution of trade for many years. While he agreed that no pecuniary consideration ought to deter the House from doing that which it deemed necessary and wise, he held it would be unjust to stop trade without compensating those who had embarked their capital in it. The Bill made no provision for this, and it was not sufficient in such a matter to accept the hon. Member's assurance of consideration. The Bill ought to contain the means by which compensation should be offered to those whose trade was interfered with. These were the reasons why he could not support the Bill. A measure introducing better regulations for good order, providing against the adulteration of drinks, further limiting the hours of sale, offering great security against the multiplication of houses, and giving effect to the well-considered opinions of a proper tribunal as to the adaptation of the number of houses to the wants of the population, would be far more effectual, and give more general satisfaction, than this one-sided, incomplete, and, he must add, unjust measure.

MR. M. A. BASS said, he thought the course taken by the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) very intelligible, but not very fair. Those who with the hon. Member were in favour of prohibiting the sale of all intoxicating liquors, but did not see any prospect of carrying their views into effect, now attempted by means of the present Bill to put in the thin end of the wedge in the hope that the time would come when, on returning from a dinner party, some one might say of his host—"That vulgar fellow had wine on the dinner table." He could not conceive how those whose object was simply to restrict intemperance could advocate the present measure. For his own part, he did not think it would be just to place in the hands of two-thirds or three-fourths, or any other proportion of the ratepayers, or of any other local body, the right to interfere with the comforts and enjoyment of the great mass of the people. What was right for one district would be good for all.

If the House passed the Bill it would permit local legislation to override Imperial legislation; and how, he asked, could the sanction of such a Bill as that now under consideration be reconciled with the commercial treaties with France and other wine-producing countries? It was impossible to make people total abstainers by Act of Parliament; and the Bill, if carried, would be systematically violated. It would, in fact, encourage secret drinking, and merely convert the people from a beer-drinking to a spirit-drinking people. Under the existing state of things temperance was on the increase; for statistics showed that while in 1750 the consumption of beer per head was 72 gallons, in 1869 it was not more than 36 to 34 gallons. He hoped the Government would introduce a measure dealing with the whole subject in such a manner as to conciliate all moderate men, and do away with the suspense in which the trade was now kept; but he trusted that no concession would be made to the permissive principle, which would have the effect of giving to local bodies the power to interfere with vast existing interests and the reasonable convenience of various districts. He wished to see a responsible licensing tribunal established, which would decide all these cases unswayed by local prejudices and local politics; and that rules should be laid down by which a certain number of public-houses might be licensed in proportion to the population of each district, their management regulated, and punishment awarded for wilful violation of the rules. The present Bill proposed to empower a number of ratepayers in any district to make an attack every year not only on the business of beer-house-keepers and publicans, but on that of all wholesale and retail dealers in intoxicating liquors, and, by a majority of two-thirds of those voting to prohibit them from selling such liquors. Was ever such a principle of legislation adopted? Those men were as honest as any other traders, and had been licensed by the State in order that they might increase the national Revenue. They were, at any rate, in common fairness entitled to compensation if their business were destroyed. The hon. Member for Denbighshire last year said—"Salus populi suprema lex," by which he meant, he supposed, that it was fair to inflict any injustice on the minority so long as the majority were benefited; but there was another maxim equally sound, and that was—“Fiat justitia ruat cælum,” which he might translate by the words—“Do justice at whatever cost.” If compensation was to be given, he should say that they who indulged in the amusement of ruining their neighbours were the proper persons to pay for that luxury. If this had been a small question no doubt it would have been dealt with by a straightforward measure; but it related to a trade with a capital of more than £100,000,000, and to a Revenue of £23,000,000. The hon. Member for Carlisle simply nibbled at the subject in the hope of bringing the country to share his views; but the question was too large for his hon. Friend to undertake, and he trusted that early next Session the Government would bring in a comprehensive measure.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he would only address a few words to the House in reply. He admitted that his Bill was imperfect; but he maintained that an imperfect measure was better than none at all. What was wanted was that the people should have a veto, and that the magistrates should not be allowed to have this power over them. If it were said that the people were not fit for such an extension of power, he, for his part, could trust them, and he hoped the House would trust them. He quite agreed with the Secretary of State for the Home Department in thinking that if the people had more resources they would abstain from drinking; but his point was that at present there were hundreds of thousands of people in this country who, without having such resources, were exposed to the temptations set before them by the Government, and it was to enable the people if they wished it to remove those temptations that he brought forward the Bill. This Bill would not interfere with any measure which the right hon. Gentleman might introduce next year; but it was needed as a supplement to any licensing system, and he therefore hoped the House would agree to the second reading.

COMMITTEE. [Progress 27th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (After passing of Act notice may be given to incumbent of intention that burial shall take place in churchyard without the rites of Established Church, and either with or without any other religious service).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 11, after the word “incumbent,” to insert the words “of any parish or ecclesiastical district in which, or in the churchyard or graveyard of which, previously to the passing of this Act, such person would have had a right of interment.”—(Mr. Goldney.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he must object to the Amendment as being unnecessary.

Question put, “That those words be there inserted.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 143: Majority 54.

MR. COLLINS said, he would beg to move, in Clause 1, line 16, to leave out the words “or graveyard.” His object was to carry out the compromise of the Committee on the Bill, by confining the operations of the Bill to churchyards, and not allowing them to extend to graveyards or cemeteries. It was evidently the intention of the Committee to confine the operation of the clause to parish churchyards.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment. He would, however, consent to introduce a Proviso in Clause 11 to meet the object the hon. Member had in view—namely, to confine the operation of the Bill to parish churchyards.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought it very inconvenient to discuss a Proviso which was not before them.

MR. CAWLEY said, he hoped the words proposed to be struck out would be retained.

Amendment negatived.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he had an Amendment to propose, which, however, he moved in no spirit of hostility to Dissenters. His earnest desire was that Dissenters should have free access to the church and churchyard—the more free the better; but the performance of Divine service within the churchyard by other than ministers of the Church of England was a violation, he did not say of decency, but of good order, which he thought they ought not to sanction. There was really no practical distinction between the performance of Divine service in the churchyard and the church. He begged to move, in line 18, to leave out “either with or.”

MR. BAINES said, the Amendment, if carried, would have the effect of destroying the whole object and principle of the Bill. It would be most offensive to Dissenters, and he thought it would be far better for the hon. Member to meet the Bill with a direct negative rather than by such a side wind as his Amendment.

MR. HEYGATE said, he hoped the Committee would accept the Amendment, as he believed that it was requisite in order to remove all danger of unseemly conflicts between ministers of different denominations within graveyards. He admitted that Nonconformists had reasonable grounds of complaint, which the Bill would remedy; but, having obtained the removal of the grievance they were exposed to, they were not justified in seeking to obtain any further concessions. Sir Morton Peto's Bill contained a restriction to the same effect as the Amendment.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, it was proposed by the Bill to allow Roman Catholics and Dissenters generally to perform their religious services in those graveyards. If that claim were allowed great offence might be given and disturbances occasioned in many places. In the South of England he knew of painful and dangerous riots arising day after day, in consequence of attempts to introduce into the parish churchyard the extravagant ceremonies of what was commonly called the Ritualistic party.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he could not accept the Amendment, because it would affect the whole principle of the Bill. The object of it was evidently to prevent Dissenters being buried with any religious services, unless that of the Church of England, or to place them on the same footing as suicides and malefactors.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had imputed to him sentiments which he had never uttered. He (Mr. Sclater-Booth) never wished Dissenters to be buried without the interposition of religious rites; but in many country places, as well as in Scotland, the religious services were performed at the residence of the deceased person.

MR. BRUCE said, the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate) spoke of the Bill as removing the last objection of the Dissenters; but if the Amendment were adopted the Bill would leave the main objection to the existing state of things untouched.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE said, the clergy had felt themselves conscientiously compelled by the canons to raise an objection to the clause.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the Dissenters were putting themselves in a wrong position. The Nonconformists were recognizing the superstition of reading prayers over the dead, which they had so long repudiated.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) wished to throw out this Bill by a side wind. He (Colonel Barttelot) intended to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Sclater-Booth), and if they were beaten he would move the omission of the clause. He particularly disliked the Bill. All his constituents also disliked the Bill. The Bill touched them in a tender point. It was running a needle into his eye. He was not prepared to allow people to run the needle into his eye. He stood up for his church and his graveyard. If his Dissenting friends were willing to enter the graveyard in his way let them come, and he was willing to receive them. If they wished to come in their own way, he was not ready to receive them. He objected to the Bill; and if it did not pass this year, and if it was re-introduced next Session, he would do his best to turn it out again.

MR. BENTINOK said, the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) was, doubtless, acquainted with the details of his own religious communion and with those of the Church of Rome. He must, then, be aware that almost the whole of the religious observances were performed in the church, and that only a very slight ceremony was gone through at the grave. The Presbyterian community throughout the world performed the last offices of the dead in their houses. The same course was pursued in Scotland.

UNIVERSITY TESTS BILL—(No. 182.)

(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING. BILL REFERRED TO A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of asking your Lordships to give a second reading to a Bill which has for its object the repeal of the tests and restrictions in respect of religious opinions at present imposed on persons who seek to occupy certain positions and to hold various offices in the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham. It will first be my duty to establish that, in principle, the measure is founded alike on justice and expediency. In doing so, I first refer to the history of our Universities. We are all aware that during the Middle Ages the interests of the then existing Church in the Universities were universal; and for the best of all reasons—namely, because in those days the Church and the nation were, speaking broadly, co-extensive. I do not desire to press the argument too far; but it will not be disputed that nothing in the nature of religious tests or restrictions then existed, and that the Universities in those times included in their walls and their circle of instruction not Englishmen only, but men of all nations, and I believe I may say of all creeds then in existence. It is, no doubt, true that after the Reformation, when religious differences began to spring up in this country, the practice of imposing tests, whether as regarded the admission of students or the holding of offices, gradually arose; but this was simply a part of what was then the general policy of the country, which imposed tests of a similar character as a qualification for admission to the Legislature and various offices, and which were then relied on as a means of bringing back men to a sense of loyalty and unanimity in matters of religion. It is matter of history that the imposition of tests and restrictions were not successful, and that so far from bringing men to an agreement on religious subjects, religious differences and the number of religious denominations have increased, so that, in spite of the many laudable and successful efforts made by the Church of England to advance the form of faith to which most of your Lordships adhere, a very large portion of the community are not now members of it. For many years past the constant and steady policy of this country has been to remove these tests and restrictions one after another from our national institutions, and the circumstances of the time and the condition of the world, over which we can exercise but small control, have brought us to a point at which we must choose between maintaining the exclusive Church character of the Universities and making them in the fullest sense national institutions. It may be held that men were happier in former times when no such choice was necessary; but the opinion of the country and the circumstances of the time render it impossible that the Legislature can much longer evade a decision, for which I believe the voice of the nation has already pronounced. I can, at any rate, say assuredly, that the opinion of the Legislature has been already pronounced upon it, for your Lordships must bear in mind that this, so far from being the first step which Parliament has taken respecting University tests, is rather the final step which we are called upon to take. In considering the Bill now before the House, your Lordships must steadily keep in mind the steps which have already been taken in this direction. Your Lordships are aware that at present men of all religious opinions are admitted to the Universities with which the Bill deals in the character of students. At Oxford and Cambridge a man of any religious opinions may enter as an undergraduate, devote himself to the studies of the University, and by his own exertions and talents gain for himself the highest academical honours. When, however, he has gained these distinctions—and the case is no hypothetical one—he is told that, according to the law as it now stands, although he may have won a Senior Wranglership he cannot, without subscribing to tests to which he cannot conscientiously submit, proceed to obtain the honours and advantages of his College and become a Fellow, say of Trinity College. Now, surely that is a state of things which it is impossible to maintain as a matter of justice and expediency. Neither can it be maintained in the interests of the Church itself; for I can conceive few things more calculated to injure the real interests of the Church. I can conceive nothing more calculated to excite indisposition or hostility towards a Church, whose influence we desire to see extending, than the exclusion, in its supposed interest, from Collegiate and University offices and emoluments, and from the Governing Body, of a man who, while an undergraduate, had been on a perfect equality with his fellow-students, and who had conferred lustre on his College and University.

These being the general arguments in favour of the measure, let me turn for a moment to the Parliamentary history of the question. When last year my noble Friend (Earl Russell), with all the weight of his great authority, asked your Lordships to read a similar measure a second time, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) moved the Previous Question, partly on the ground that this was to your Lordships a comparatively novel question. Now, whatever may have been the fact as to this House, it cannot be said that as a Parliamentary question this is a novel one. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has been engaged, with his usual power and energy, in more than one contest in the House of Commons upon the question; and, with one exception, there has not been a Session since 1864 in which a measure dealing with the subject has not been brought forward in that House. The question has been considered in no less than three distinct Parliaments, in every one of which the opinion of that House has been more and more decidedly affirmed in favour of the principle of the Bill. I admit that in 1864 that opinion was of a doubtful description, for the Bill was thrown out on one occasion by a majority of 2; but in 1865 it passed the second reading, although circumstances prevented its further progress. In the Parliament elected in the autumn of 1865 the opinion of the House of Commons became more pronounced; and in 1867 a measure dealing with tests as far as the Universities were concerned came up to this House, when the second reading was moved by my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley), and rejected by no very large majority. In the present Parliament—partly perhaps on account of the removal from the House of Commons of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), but partly on account of the progress of opinion in the country—the majorities in favour of the measure have become more and more decided than on any previous occasion. Under these circumstances, your Lordships are called upon to re-consider your previous decisions on this question. I can claim no right to express an opinion as to the feeling of the Universities themselves in regard to this Bill; but this I can give as a matter of fact—I understand that both at Oxford and Cambridge a very large proportion of those engaged in the actual work of teaching are in favour of the principle of the Bill.

This being the history of the past with regard to the measure, I need detain your Lordships but a very short time in explaining its provisions. The measure deals not only with the Universities, but with the Colleges within them. It provides that all tests and restrictions as to graduation and offices founded on religious opinion shall be abolished. This, as regards the Universities, was the principle of the Bill of last Session, as it was also more or less of the Bills offered in previous Sessions; but with regard to the Colleges there is a material difference which it is right I should point out. The Bill of last year simply gave power to the Governing Bodies of the Colleges to make what arrangements they might think fit with respect to the admission of graduates to honours, Fellowships, and a share in the government of the Colleges. So far the Bill of last year was a permissive Bill; whereas the Bill now before your Lordships is one of an imperative character, declaring that all religious tests shall henceforth be done away with. The permissive proposal of last year, however, met with little favour either at the hands of University reformers or from the direct opponents of those reforms; and, as I understand, even in the Universities and the Colleges there was a general feeling that a permissive measure would lead to many and continuous disputes, and a common consent that it would be better for Parliament to legislate directly and decidedly upon the subject. In consequence of these representations the permissive principle has been abandoned in this Bill, and it absolutely repeals all statutory enactments contrary to its principle. It is important, however, to remember that the 4th clause of the Bill is intended to protect the religious character of the education given at the Universities. The clause was introduced into the Bill of last year on the Motion of Sir Roundell Palmer, and the arrangement was deemed so satisfactory by that hon. and learned Gentleman that he withdrew all further opposition to the Bill, and Her Majesty's Government have adopted it without hesitation. I attach some importance to this clause, because I am not one of those who desire to see what is called exclusively secular education or colourless religious teaching introduced into the Universities. By this Bill your Lordships will find that a renewed Parliamentary sanction is given to the religious character of the instruction to be imparted at the Universities; so that, as it appears to me, while we maintain the religious character of the instruction given at our ancient seats of learning, we shall at the same time by this Bill remove the obstacles which have hitherto prevented a wider and more general participation in the benefits of a University education. It might naturally have been hoped that, after the frequent discussions the subject has undergone and the numerous Bills which have been sent up from the other House, the Motion with which I am about to conclude would be agreed to without any opposition. Last year the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) moved the Previous Question, chiefly on the ground that further consideration was required, for he did not like to combat the principle of the measure, and he urged that Oxford had had no time or opportunity of considering the question. That plea can hardly be repeated after the lapse of 12 months; but I find that I am to be met by a Motion, not directed against the principle of the Bill, but calculated to raise a by-issue. No man can doubt the sincere interest which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) feels in everything which relates to the permanent welfare of our Universities—especially of that illustrious one which has recently conferred on him, with so much wisdom and advantage to itself, the highest honour it is in its power to bestow. I cannot for a moment doubt that the noble Marquess is influenced by a pure desire to maintain the advantages which the Universities confer upon the country. At the same time, I think I shall be able to show reasons for doubting whether the course the noble Marquess proposes to pursue is the best calculated to secure the objects in view. The noble Marquess proposes to meet the Motion for the second reading of the Bill by two Resolutions. To the first of these I should be disposed to interpose no objection, were it not interposed in the way of the second reading of the Bill. I am bound to say that, taking the words of that Resolution in their general sense, they are not in my mind inconsistent with the general principle of the Bill. Indeed, on comparing it with part of the Preamble of the measure, it will be found substantially identical with it. [The Marquess of SALISBURY: It is a transcript of it.] My noble Friend admits more than I was going to argue, for he acknowledges that his Resolution is a transcript from the Preamble. Now, if he thinks that the Bill does not sufficiently carry out the declaration of the Preamble, let him in Committee propose Amendments for that purpose; and provided they are consistent with his own Resolution in enabling “persons not members of the Church of England to hold offices to which they are not now eligible,” I shall be ready to give the most careful and complete consideration to any proposal which may provide—

I should have the greatest hopes that the noble Marquess and your Lordships would accept the offer which in all sincerity I make if the first Resolution stood alone; but, unfortunately, there is behind a second Resolution, to which I cannot so readily assent. When I first read that Resolution I confess I was somewhat startled, and found it difficult to comprehend the meaning. At first reading it seemed simply intended—though I may have been doing an injustice to the noble Marquess—to get rid of the Bill altogether. It does not even propose the appointment of a Select Committee, but merely speaks of a Committee, and it is so vague and general that I regarded it as an euphemistic mode of rejecting the Bill. [The Marquess of SALISBURY was understood to intimate that he intended a Select Committee.] Then I will not press that argument. But there is another which I am obliged to press. If the noble Marquess thought a great advantage would be derived from an inquiry by your Lordships’ House into all the bearings of the subject, why, when he was apprised by the Speech from the Throne that the Government intended to deal with the question, did he not take the earliest opportunity—especially as he is so apt to complain of your Lordships having nothing to do—of proposing a Select Committee, in order that the subject might be fairly investigated, and that when the Bill reached this House your Lordships might be fully informed upon it? I venture to think that the notion of a Committee and of an inquiry suggested itself at a later period, and had some connection with the shadow, if not with the actual presence of this Bill. He does not even now propose a Select Committee on the Bill, but he wishes to set the Bill aside and refer the general question to a Committee; the effect of which must, of course, be to postpone, at least for another year, the settlement of the question. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) and the noble Marquess are evidently sensible that a settlement of the question on the principle of this Bill is inevitable, for otherwise they would distinctly oppose the second reading. Such a settlement being, then, inevitable, what substantial advantage does the noble Marquess expect to obtain by a twelvemonths’ postponement? Nobody knows better than he that our ancient Universities have before them a great and important task. They have to consider to what extent and in what manner they can admit into the curriculum of their studies those sciences which during the last quarter of a century have grown so rapidly as almost to threaten the overshadowing of other branches of knowledge. They have the task of combining those subjects with the ancient and time-honoured studies to which they have hitherto devoted themselves, and of reconciling the spirit of those modern studies with that spirit of religious faith for which the Universities are distinguished. That is a great and truly national work—one of wide and vast importance. How can it be advanced by the continuance for another year of the agitation upon this worn-out question? Is it desirable to divert the Universities from their real duty for the sake of maintaining a contest which is really settled, a battle which has long been lost, on a question which my noble Friend will admit to be of vastly inferior importance to the more pressing task to which I have alluded? It appears to me that such a course is fraught only with mischief to the Universities themselves—it will only increase the agitation and party bitterness which we have already experienced. Entertaining these views, and believing this measure to be just and expedient, I earnestly entreat your Lordships, for the sake of the Universities themselves, for the sake of the Church, for the sake of justice to individuals and the interests of the nation at large, to read this Bill a second time.

*Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2*."*
—(The Lord President.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I trust that I shall be able to clear myself from the imputation which the noble Lord President, to some extent, threw upon me, of having unnecessarily delayed the Motion for a Committee to inquire into the measure proposed by the Government, when, warned by the Queen's Speech, I might have done it earlier in the Session. I confess that that course occurred to me at the beginning of the year; but on consideration, I said to myself—"This is a measure which has never before been adopted as a Government measure; the House of Commons and the Ministry depend entirely upon one eminent individual; and that eminent individual has himself but very recently held the opinion which I wish to defend. He has a perfect right, like everybody else, on sufficient cause shown, to change his opinion; but the inevitable impression made by such a change is that a further change is always possible." People doubt the stability of convictions recently acquired—and acquired in opposition to the previous convictions of a whole life; and I, therefore, thought to myself that although we should certainly know what the Bill would be when brought into the House of Commons, yet it was probable that we should know nothing, whatever its original shape, of what it would be when it left the House of Commons and was sent up to the House of Lords. Feeling, therefore, that it was of very little use to inquire into a measure of which we did not know the exact provisions, I thought it the wisest and most convenient course to defer any proposition for inquiry until we knew what the subject of inquiry was likely to be. And I confess I am glad I did so, for an inquiry into the Bill as it went into the House of Commons would have been of little use in its bearing upon the present Bill as it has been sent up to us by the Commons. The question, as the noble Earl has remarked, has been for many Sessions the subject of private Motions. It has been handed over from independent Member to independent Member of the House of Commons; it has been carried by gradually increasing majorities, and at last it has been adopted by a Government some of whose Members have almost up to the end retained their objections to it. In that respect it does not differ much from the genesis of many other Bills with which I am acquainted; but it differs from all that I know in this—that it has reached the stage of ultimate legislation, dealing with such important interests, without any inquiry by a Royal Commission or by a Committee of either House. My duty is not to argue against the principle of the Bill, if by the principle of the Bill is meant the admission to offices of persons who cannot now hold office in the Universities—my business is to impress on your Lordships that so grave a step in legislation ought not, if you are faithful to your own traditions and precedents, to be adopted without due and careful inquiry. What is the object of this Bill. My noble Friend the Lord President has sufficiently explained what, to his mind, is its object. He desires to admit persons who are generally, though somewhat vaguely, known as "orthodox Dissenters" to the benefits of University honours and emoluments, from which they are now excluded by the test of subscription to the Thirty Nine Articles. That is a very intelligible and, from their point of view, a very legitimate object on the part of the Dissenters—were I a Dissenter myself I should do very much the same thing. It is quite right that the adherents to any form of belief should do their best to attain all that may tend to the honour and propagation of that belief; nor do I dispute that the circumstances of the day have very much changed with respect to the power of resisting such a claim. I do not profess to have changed my opinion; but seeing what the political forces of the day are, and knowing, as I have had the opportunity of knowing, the opinions of the leading men—at least in the University to which I have the honour to belong—I do not intend to maintain that we desire as an object to exclude Nonconformists from University and collegiate honours and emoluments. We are content that that should be so, subject to one condition. We are content to admit that in the present condition of the world—in the existing state of things—it would be wiser and better, and more for the interests of peace, learning, and religion, to admit such a state of things than to resist it. But there is one condition—a condition affirmed in the Preamble of this Bill, and as a mere abstract piece of sentimentality contained in the clauses, though there is not one shred of enactment to secure it—the one condition to which we attach an importance immeasurably superior to any consideration of honours or emoluments. I will describe it in the very words of the Government—

“It is expedient that such restrictions, tests, and disabilities should be removed, under proper safeguards for maintenance of religious instruction and worship in the said Universities and the Colleges and Halls now subsisting within the same.”

These words point, whether designedly or not, to the real enemy with whom we have to contend. Our contention with the Dissenters has been in one sense only political. The points on which the mass of the Dissenters differ from the Church of England are points upon which, in their day, men felt with intense earnestness and fought with unflagging vigour, and I do not wish to underrate their importance; but they are points from which the intellectual interest of the age has passed away. They are no longer the battle-fields of religious controvery. The points of Church government which separate us from the Wesleyans and Independents, the question of the age of baptism which separates us from another important sect—important as these questions are, and I should be sorry to treat them as trivial—they are not points on which those who are interested in the condition of Christendom, all who look with interest on the present relations of the progress of civilization and the purity of Christian faith, are most deeply interested. We feel that the battle is shifted to another ground, and that we have to deal with a much more potent and dangerous enemy. The progress of physical science, the gradual familiarity which political events have given us with the modes of thought of the Eastern world—these, together with other less powerful causes, have produced effects on the human mind similar to those which previous inventions and discoveries have produced. Just as 300 years ago the discovery of America, the invention of printing, and the sudden familiarity with ancient literature dazzled and confused men's minds, and drove them in some cases from the landmarks of the faith—so in our day there is a violent movement towards utter unbelief, which is principally felt among the most educated and cultivated classes of society. No one who deserves the name of Christian can look upon that movement with anything of permanent alarm, or can believe it will ultimately compromise interests very dear to us; but undoubtedly it is a force which, within our own generation, has been tremendous, and we cannot say it is yet spent. No doubt, after a time, better counsels, a more moderate estimate of the relations of the new discoveries to the ancient beliefs and their bearing on the ancient faith will prevail; but, in the meanwhile, we have to deal with a class of men, earnest men of clear and powerful intellect, honest, pure in the morality which they have derived from the Christianity which they repudiate, who seek with all the earnestness of a religious propaganda to overthrow the religion in which they have been brought up. That is the real enemy whom we have to deal, and all our differences of opinion on points of secondary importance with Dissenters sink into immeasurable insignificance compared with the magnitude of this contest. Now, it is from the feeling that this Bill bears upon this great controversy, that it may for the course of some time, if carried in its present form, delay the ultimate and sure victory of the truth and cause many souls to be gathered into the net of error, that I have always looked upon it as far superior in importance to any measures dealing with merely secular and terrestrial interests. I am aware that, happily, there are very few in Parliament who would be prepared to maintain the desirability of giving free course to unbelief. That the Dissenting forces are used by those who desire such an issue I do not doubt; but I know well that those who are really guiding the Dissenting forces do so with a scarcely concealed contempt for the credulity of the allies they are forced to use. I can understand statesmen who have not thought of these things wishing to thrust aside a controversy which is always barren and certainly acrimonious; and therefore many sophistries, if I may call them so, have been devised to induce us to believe that a measure of this kind will have no influence in forwarding the progress of those errors to which I have called attention. It is said, for instance, that tests are of no real effect, and they have been compared to a hedge or wall which can easily be broken through or climbed over. Well, no doubt, there are people who can break through tests just as there are unscrupulous intruders who can climb over a wall or force their way through a hedge; but you do not on that account abandon your garden walls, and I see no prudence in abandoning tests in the case of institutions to which they are adapted. They do keep out a very large proportion of the persons against whom they are directed, though, no doubt, there are a certain number of people with minds sufficiently subtle and consciences sufficiently elastic to break through them. If I wanted to prove the efficiency of tests I should not refer to mere theoretical arguments, but give a practical illustration. No set of people in the world are freer from prejudices connected with antiquated traditions than our cousins on the other side of the Atlantic. Yet the Americans, when, in the height of a fierce political contest, they desired to keep certain members out of Congress, could conceive of nothing more efficient than the anti-quoted tests which you despise. If those tests were not practically useful, I am sure the Americans would not have adopted them; and, as a matter of fact, they have effected the object in view, and they keep out everyone whom their authors desired to keep out. But then we are told that the Church is strong in the Universities, and that if you only give free trade and fair play in regard to religion, the Church will be in no danger. If the Universities had the power of electing the Fellows and Tutors of each College, I should admit that there was a great deal of force in the argument; but those who use it do so in utter forgetfulness of the strange constitutions of our Colleges. The College Fellows have always been a body electing their own members; and the perpetuation of that body has been confided to the existing Fellows who have had the entire power over the education of their College. It was for them to decide whether the statutes should be altered, and on what conditions, and with what qualifications the Tutors should be selected. Until 1854, the Fellows had absolute discretion as to whom they should elect; but in that year Parliament passed a statute altering all this. It deprived the Fellows of their absolute power, and said to them—"You shall take the man who has done the best in an intellectual examination." The consequence is, that the condition of the Colleges has come to this—the College Tutors now consist of men who, at the age of 22, or thereabouts, are able to compose better Greek Iambics, or to give a better account of Greek philosophy than their fellow-students. On that qualification, and on that qualification alone, they have gained a permanent right to govern and control the education of the youth of this country. There is no appeal against their decision; there is no power of regulating them; and neither the State nor the Universities can interfere with them. Whatever happens, the circumstance of their having had at the age of 22 this peculiar educational qualification enables them—no matter how much their opinions may subsequently change on matters of belief or morality—to go on to their dying day regulating the discipline and appointing the officers of their College. So long as there was a statutory guarantee for the faith of these College Fellows, it perhaps was not worth while to interfere. The arrangement was always an anomalous one; but I can understand that, as long as there existed some guarantee for the faith of the Tutors and the Fellows, it might be sustained. It does seem to me, however, that you are exposed to extreme danger if you allow—if on the mere score of intellectual superiority at the age of 22 you allow this vested right of managing education to men for whose religious belief or opinions you have not the slightest guarantee. I do not for a moment pretend that if the course of opinion in this country should unhappily be such that Christianity loses its hold over the people, and if they should no longer desire their children to be brought up in that religious belief, it would be possible to prevent the Universities from being drawn into that common destiny. What I say is this—that the Universities should not become the echo of every vicissitude of opinion. As the Colleges are now constituted, a very small number of men might make a College in either of the Universities a centre for propagating unbelief. In many of the Colleges, the Fellows are not more than a dozen or so in number, and by reason of some of them being non-resident, the practical Governing Body is reduced to six or seven. These are selected purely on this principle of their intellectual superiority at the age of 22 or 23, and four or five persons who had got in on this ground, if it so happened that they were agreed in opinions hostile to Christianity, might set up an infidel College in the midst of either University. There would be absolutely nothing to prevent this. You may say, perhaps, that this is exceedingly improbable. I admit its improbability; but still the mere chance of some three or four men holding peculiar opinions being able to get in, seems a very dangerous thing to which to trust the education of our youth. What I dread more than anything else is that, at an age when the character is unformed, the passions strong, and the conviction not yet settled, young men going to the Universities should find College set against College, and Professor against Professor, with reference to the deepest mysteries of the Christian faith, and all that they had been accustomed to regard with reverence, and all the restraining truths of religion called in question every hour of the day. You cannot, I am aware, silence differences of opinion—truth must be fought out amidst controversy—but the young, with tender and unformed minds, surely ought not to be plunged, at the most dangerous period of life, into the arena of such controversies as these. I maintain that the constitution of our Universities is not fitted for this unrestricted liberty of religious opinion, and that we must overhaul the whole question, and go into all the arrangements which have existed so long, if we are about to introduce an element so strange and novel. I do not see how, in justice to the parents of this country who, undoubtedly, look to the Universities to bring up their children in the habits of morality and the truths of religion, we can establish a system which would offer such a fair field for an infidel propaganda. I have heard no argument against this inquiry—nothing that anyone could say was worthy to be called an argument. My noble Friend (Earl De Grey and Ripon) indeed descanted on the dangers of delay, and hinted that, if delay occurs, we shall have something worse than the present measure. Well, my Lords, I am quite at ease on that score, for I defy my noble Friend to produce a worse measure than this.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that he had made no hint of the kind referred to.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I certainly thought I heard my noble Friend say something about the agitation growing every day more acrimonious; but I am very glad to find I was mistaken on this point. As to what my noble Friend said about delay, it is quite clear that, if there is no evil in delay, the case for inquiry becomes overwhelming. Remember that the step you are asked to take in my Motion is quite in accordance with precedent; because small measures as well as large ones have always been preceded by adequate and sufficient inquiry. Previous to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, previous to the alteration of the Lectionary, you had such an inquiry; and the very fact that my noble Friend and we on this side of the House differ so widely as to the effect of the Bill, and as to whether the 4th clause affords an adequate protection from religious instruction, is in itself sufficient to show that inquiry is necessary before we proceed to the second reading of this Bill. I should like the House to listen again to what my noble Friend believes to be a security for religious worship and instruction. The 4th clause provides that "Nothing in this Act shall interfere with or affect—any further or otherwise than is herein expressly enacted—the system of religious instruction, worship, and discipline which now is or may hereafter be lawfully established in the said Universities respectively, or in the Colleges thereof or any of them, or the statutes and ordinances of the said Universities and Colleges respectively relating to such instruction, worship, and discipline."

Of course, we are asked to assume that the Bill does what it says it does; and, consequently, my noble Friend tells us that it secures religious worship and instruction. I do not differ from the Preamble; but it certainly does not appear to me to be an extravagant thing to ask that, when we are called upon to pass a measure professing to be in conformity with the Preamble, we should take means to inquire whether that conformity is real or not. It appears to me that we are called upon to alter a system which has existed for centuries, and to introduce in its place one of which we know nothing. Surely, the mere circumstance that we are called upon to do this—and called upon to do it in opposition to the strongly-expressed opinion of the majority of those bodies with whom the Bill deals—is a sufficient ground for granting the inquiry for which I ask. I would only put it to your Lordships as a question of alternative. Just as a matter of hypothesis, compare the risk of the two courses which you are called upon to take. It may be that we are wrong—it may be that the Bill does provide, as it professes to do, sufficient security for religious instruction and worship. In such an event, what evil will have been done by referring the matter to a Select Committee? The truth will come out in due time; and, by adopting the course I recommend, your Lordships will adhere to your ordinary traditions and precedents of legislation, and you will legislate with all the more confidence because you will legislate carefully. But suppose, on the other hand, that our anticipations are well-founded, and that this Bill is about to cut the link between religious and other instruction in the Universities, I ask you to consider the evil which would be caused by hot precipitation. You will have inflicted evils which are absolutely irreparable; you will have deprived the people of this country of their most efficient instrument for sustaining the Christian faith, and for upholding Christian morality; and you will have despoiled the Universities of that which has been for centuries their chiefest honour, and which is now their most endearing claim to the affections of the people.

Amendment moved, to leave out from ("that") to the end of the Motion, and insert the following Resolution, viz. :—

"In any measure for enabling persons not members of the Church of England to hold offices to which they are not now eligible in the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham, and the Colleges and Halls in those Universities, it is essential to provide by law proper safeguards for the maintenance of religious instruction and worship and for the religious character of the education to be given therein."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD: My Lords, being so closely connected with the University of Oxford, I think I need not apologize to your Lordships for making a few remarks on this important subject. I am the more anxious to do so because I feel that, notwithstanding what the noble Marquess the Chancellor of the University has said, it is my duty to vote against the Amendment which he has just proposed. I am quite willing to admit that there are many reasons why I, and I suppose many of your Lordships, should regret that there is any necessity for this measure; but my regrets go farther back than most people's. I not only regret that it should be necessary to bring in a measure for the abolition of tests, but I regret that it was ever necessary to enact them. I am very sorry that a state of things should ever have existed in England, rendering it necessary to provide on behalf of one part of the country against the admission of another part to any privilege to which all seem to be prima facie entitled. If all had been of one mind—if all the subjects of the Crown of England had been members of the Church of England—the tests would have been unnecessary; but it was in view of religious divisions that tests were enacted, and it is in view of religious divisions that it is now sought to repeal them. There is little doubt public opinion supported their introduction, and there is no doubt that, at present, public opinion supports their abolition. It is folly, then, on the part of either branch of the Legislature—for I make no distinction between them—to attempt to resist the mature political conviction of the country when it has been clearly expressed; and if it be the verdict of public opinion that all Englishmen shall have equal right to the endowments and honours of the great Universities, it is folly to resist this verdict, and to go on upholding a succession of untenable posts until you have no longer the power to dictate the terms of your surrender—while the very fact of your resistance is calculated to diminish the weight of your advice, or, perhaps, to preclude you from giving it in all subsequent consideration of the question. Yet this is what we should be doing if we adopted the Amendment. I cannot regard that Amendment as other than an attempt, for the present Session at least, to defeat the Bill, and I cannot see that the Committee the noble Marquess asks for would in any way affect the conclusion to which your Lordships are invited to come. I can think of nothing into which that Committee would inquire which is not obvious to the minds of all who know anything of those who are resident in the Universities. I admit there are very strong opinions in the Universities against the measure; it was only yesterday I was told that if I voted for this Bill—this accursed measure, my correspondent was pleased to call it—I should lose every friend I valued in Oxford. I have a better opinion of Oxford—I have a better opinion of my friends than to be intimidated by that threat. And now, if your Lordships will allow me, I will give you my reasons for supporting the Bill. As I understand it, the Church of England is face to face with a new order of things. The Church of England is face to face with the conviction of the country that the Universities are to be opened; and it seems to me that it would be wisdom on the part of the Church frankly to accept the situation, and, as far as she may, to guide and control the movement. It is vain for the Church to cling to Acts of Parliament in matters of this kind. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has said that this Bill contains provisions on behalf of religion which are illusory and sentimental. I cannot see that the Bill is to enact anything which would prevent the Universities from maintaining their religious character. The present tests have no effect in maintaining the religious character of the Universities. There are Colleges at Oxford at this moment where a candidate for a Fellowship, known to have strongly religious sentiments, would have no chance against a latitudinarian competitor. There are Tutors at these Colleges, who make no secret of entertaining views hostile to Christianity; the present tests do not restrain them. If I were to choose between a Freethinker and a pious Dissenter, in electing to an office of influence in the University, I should choose the pious Dissenter. ["Hear, hear!"] I thought this Bill was to admit the Dissenters—[A noble LORD: "Not the Freethinkers"],—and I do not see that their admission would so seriously affect the Universities as some people think. I would even say that in point of morality and sobriety some Colleges may be usefully affected by an element such as I have described. The noble Marquess speaks in his Amendment of "safeguards in law;" but as protectors of religion it seems to me these standards fixed by law do more harm than good. No religious teaching is forbidden by the Bill—it was not the intention of its authors to forbid it. Some have said it would be improper under its provisions even to say grace in College hall; but, so far from that, as I read it, the Bill would allow the restoration of the old College practice of reading a good book during meals if the Society wished to restore it; and surely the noble Marquess does not mean to say we shall not, if the Bill is passed, elect Christians to be Fellows. We mean to uphold Christianity not in spite of this Bill, but by virtue of this Bill; we mean to uphold Christianity, because the Bill leaves us perfectly free to uphold it, more free than under the false system of the present time. I do not cherish any illusions. I do not suppose that when this Bill becomes law Dissenters and Churchmen will all immediately live at peace. I am very well aware—more so during the past few weeks than before—that a great number of men who, I suppose, love religion much hate the Church a great deal more, and with regard to them I do not suppose this Bill will tend to produce amity; but the influences of what is called extreme political Dissent are not the influences which prevail at the Universities. They have their spheres in vestries and election committee-rooms, not in academical Senates and Convocations. The pious Dissenter who really values learning and religion is the man who will come in under the Bill. I claim the same credit for honesty in holding my opinions as is claimed for those from whom I differ. I believe that religion will prosper as much without these tests as under them; and I ask noble Lords who oppose the Bill not to think that we who support it are given up to wicked imaginings, but are as honest and true friends of religion as themselves, and as determined to maintain it in its integrity and at all hazards.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL said, that though he concurred in much that his right rev. Brother had said, he could not but think that the whole tone of his address sounded as that of one who receded step by step before the foe. Whatever views they might take up on this question, they should regard each other as honourable and honest men who differed on certain points, and who were moved by a conscientious desire to do what was right; and, therefore, he was not prepared to regard those upon whom they were seeking to confer privileges as hostile. He confessed frankly that he was prepared to stand by the Amendment of the noble Marquess—not with a view of gaining time, which, in many cases, meant gaining time in following a disastrous cause; but the time they were now seeking to gain was a proceeding based on considerations of the deepest regard for religion. The whole tenour of the remarks he was then making turned upon his feeling that this Bill would not conduce to the best interests of religion, although he was satisfied that that was not the belief of those who had introduced the measure, and who appeared to regard the safeguards it contained as sufficient to protect those interests. The proposal of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) was that an opportunity should be afforded for eliciting the opinion of the country upon the subject, so that that opinion might be ascertained with something like certainty. With regard to the question whether Dissenters should be admitted to our Universities or not, he should take a very different tone from that of his right rev. Brother. There were three arguments why Nonconformists should be admitted to the Universities. The first was the great argument of common sense; the second was, that having conceded privileges to the Nonconformists long ago further privileges must be conceded to them; and the third was, that the larger half of the Nonconformists had proved themselves worthy of those privileges. There was, however, another argument that came more nearly home to themselves, and that was the argument of feeling. That very day he had spent six long hours in a circumscribed chamber not 100 yards from that House, round the table in which were grouped Nonconformists, mingled with the dignitaries of the Church of England; and he felt that it was a duty to extend to men, who had proved themselves worthy, the opportunities of the highest culture. Therefore, upon the question of feeling alone, he should be disposed to admit the Nonconformists into the Universities. There was, however, one very plain and distinct point to which he wished to draw attention—and that was, whether the Bill, in proposing to open the door to the Nonconformists—to whom he would willingly concede entrance—would not also open the door to the Freethinkers, the Secularists, and to those who at this moment were endeavouring to strike down religion under their feet? If their Lordships were of opinion that the Bill would have that effect, it became their duty, as plain, simple, earnest men, to fall back upon the Amendment of the noble Marquess, which suggested that they should pause before they entered upon such a rapid and downward course, and decline to proceed until they had ascertained whether the serious fears that were entertained with respect to the security of religion were or were not well founded. Having said thus much upon the general question, he now came to consider the matter in detail. It was evident that the measure contemplated certain results; but those results were stated by those who were attempting to legislate upon this subject to be fully counterbalanced by certain safeguards. He would proceed to inquire, in the first place, whether the results which it was anticipated would follow the Bill were formidable in their character; and, secondly, whether the safeguards were or were not sufficiently strong to resist the apprehended evil. If he could establish the formidable character of those results and the insufficient nature of the safeguards, he should have some ground why the proposition of the noble Marquess should be entertained. He would test the Bill by the effect it would have first upon the Colleges and then upon the Universities. When a young man entered the College he was brought into the immediate control of the tutor; the Dean of the College, who looked after his morality and his attendance upon public worship; and, thirdly, the Master of the College. Under this Bill the Tutor might be not only a layman—to which he had not the slightest objection—but a man who had no creed whatever, and one who would pass by with almost a sneer all sacred truths. Again, what would be the feelings of the youth if the Dean of the College, who more or less superintended his moral bearing, and the Master of the College, were habitually absent from public worship and treated religious matters with levity? The way that the Universities would be affected by the Bill was this—There were at Cambridge four Professorships, the first of which must necessarily be held by a clergyman of the Church of England, and the holder of the second, being elected by the Bachelors of Divinity, might be assumed to be a religious man. The holders of the Norrisian and the Hulsean Professorships were, however, elected by the General Congregation, and might be men of no religious belief whatever, as far as the terms of the Bill went. Much had been said of the 4th clause; but the 5th clause had not been sufficiently alluded to. All the sting of the Bill lay in that clause, and in Christian fairness the two clauses ought to be read together. By that clause certain Acts of Parliament were repealed in whole or in part. Part of the Act of Uniformity was repealed, and the consequence would be that the Colleges might make what alterations they pleased in the celebration of Divine service; because it was hardly to be supposed that the recommendations arrived at by any of the Colleges would be refused by the Queen in Council. Therefore, he feared that disastrous changes would follow on the passing of this Bill, and he claimed on behalf of not only sons of members of the Church of England, but for the sons of Nonconformists, that care should be taken to prevent such consequences, for they could not be afterwards removed by Amendments made in that House. He was anxious that the Committee should be appointed for the ulterior purpose of leading to the introduction of a broad and comprehensive measure, that should deal with several matters in the Colleges needing reform. As an illustration of the points to which he referred he might ask whether it was fair that young men obtaining Fellowships should take hundreds of pounds away from their University, while they prepared at a distance for Parliamentary life, or some other pursuits, and never return anything to their Alma Mater? In this and other matters reform was necessary, and therefore he was in favour of a full consideration of the subject.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER: My Lords, it must be a great satisfaction to those who have watched the growth of feeling with regard to this question for so many years, to find that the country and the Legislature have at length come to one point, at any rate, on which all men seem to agree. All seem to be agreed that it is no longer possible, and no longer right to exclude from office and emoluments in our great Universities those who conscientiously are not members of the Church of England. The question, when we have come to that point, is not what shall be done, but how shall it be done? I think, my Lords, we ought not only to pass this Bill, but pass it with the least possible delay. I am confident that, for the interests of truth and justice, and, emphatically and above all, for the interests of the Church of England, delay would be a serious mischief. It is mischievous that we should be, day by day, alienating from that Church the affections of many of her own sons, and provoking still more the hostility of those who are without her pale. We are constantly alienating the affections of those who belong to us, who were brought up in our own communion. Many who were taught the doctrines of the Church of England find these tests a very heavy burden to bear. Many are lost to the Church because we require of them what their consciences will not accept. When a young man carries off a Fellowship, and signs the necessary declaration, it often occurs that he is vexed in conscience by all manner of questions which it would be much better to allow him to put aside, and consider calmly and deliberately, and without anything depending on his decision. But by the very nature of the case, he is obliged to settle such questions for himself at once, or forfeit the character of an honest man. When he proceeds to examine them, he is all the while tormented with the thought that possibly he may be doing wrong in retaining his Fellowship at all; and, at the same time, he is prompted to come to a conclusion years before he ought to do so, from the fear that he should otherwise be dishonestly holding his place. It is no trifling thing to put a young man in such a difficulty. The result is, that either he retains his Fellowship in spite of doubts and to the injury of his conscience, or, finding that the scales are unfairly weighed, and seeing that it will be impossible to decide a question in which his personal interests are involved, he throws up his Fellowship and stands aside. From that day forward his mind has received a fatal twist, and he may be unable for ever after to forget how he had been treated at such a critical time. If left to himself these questions would be settled in a legitimate manner, by his quietly thinking over them until the conclusion to which his conscience would lead him should be quite clear to his understanding. Whilst, however, he is called upon to decide under such circumstances as exist at present, it is almost inevitable that difficulties should arise like mountains before him, and that doubts which were in reality hardly worth considering, should appear insurmountable obstacles, and, in this frame of mind, you call upon him to decide what must affect the whole future tenour of his life. He knows perfectly well that, as far as the duties of a Tutor are concerned, there are many subjects which he can teach without troubling himself about these points. But now, if he is a mathematician, and wants to teach mathematics; if he is a Greek scholar, and wants to teach Greek; if he is a student of Natural Science, and wants to teach Natural Science, he is compelled long before he is fit for their decision, to decide for himself the most momentous questions that can possibly be put before anyone to determine. I do not mean to say these tests may not have been of use in protecting the Church in the Universities in other times. At a period when there is no great amount of speculation going on, when people are not eagerly bent on the pursuit of the most difficult truths, when the intellects of men are, as it were, stagnating, then certainly it is quite possible to turn out one or two restless spirits who choose to depart from the ordinary line of thought, and to keep the rest of the University quite quiet. But, as it is now, these tests, so far from keeping out anybody, are absolutely of themselves, to a great degree, the very cause why there is so much mischievous speculation going on in young men's minds. They are forced to consider these questions, and even if they would leave them alone, as many of them would be disposed to do, they have no choice in the matter. I speak from experience, and I say I am sure that, as long as this state of things continues, the Church of England must suffer, and suffer in a way which it is most difficult to meet. They may be a few who are thus compelled to enter into these speculations and decide for themselves; but they are the very pick of the Universities—the very men who are to lead their fellow-men; and to lose one of them is a matter of grievous consequence. Very often I would rather sacrifice the endowments of the Universities altogether than lose the men who are sometimes lost through the present system. Meanwhile, my Lords, what is the impression we are making on those outside of the Church. The Bill is rejected; a year is lost; then it comes before us again, and now once more it is proposed to postpone it. Will the Dissenters really believe that this is done for no other purpose than simply to provide safeguards for religion, when they are put off year after year, and when they know perfectly well that all who have anything to do with the question have had plenty of opportunities of studying it to the bottom, and ought to know by this time what kind of safeguards they require? It is said the Bill does not contain sufficient safeguards. What kind of safeguards are we to have? Are we to devise new tests? [“No!”] We are not to require these men to be members of the Church of England! Are we to require them to hold some new religion to be invented by the Legislature? What sort of restrictions are we to have? How can we provide anything that is not provided already? The safeguards contained in this Bill are the very kind which these postponements put in peril. You have these safeguards—that a certain number of the Headships of Colleges and the clerical Fellowships are protected by the Bill at present. ["Oh!"] Certainly, the Heads of Colleges are open by the Bill in as far as they are laymen without any restriction; but I do not see that it anywhere opens them in as far as they are clergymen. Therefore I say that this, which is one of the safeguards in the Bill, still stands—that the clerical Heads of Colleges still remain; and I say this is one of the very safeguards that you put in peril by delay. Anyone who watches the course of feeling in this country will see what is the popular instinct in these matters. That popular instinct endeavours, as far as it can, to provide for religion everywhere; and, thank God, the people of England happily are still truly religious. The people still desire that there should be religious instruction. But they constantly see that those who have charge of that religious instruction contend so bitterly among themselves, that it is hardly possible to contrive that it shall be provided through their means; and the tendency of the popular mind is at last to say—"We will have nothing to do with religious instruction at all; we must come down to that about which there is no such bitter contention, and have a purely secular system." The country is, I believe, now opposed to a secular system, and will only be driven to it by finding it impracticable to bring about some agreement among those who have the charge of religious instruction. But that is the road we are going. Now this Bill still protects the clerical Headships of Colleges and the clerical Fellowships. But wait another year, and the chances are you may then find that the clerical Fellowships and the clerical Headships of Colleges are gone too. This is no menace. It is not a thing that I desire, nor do I believe the Government desire it; but it is the irresistible current of popular feeling; and I am quite sure you will put in peril the remaining safeguards of religious instruction if you allow this Bill to wait. What is it, I ask, that we are to wait for? I do not wish to speak with any disrespect of what was said by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) or by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Gloucester), but it really seems to me that the fears they have expressed are almost ludicrously exaggerated. What are we to be afraid of? That one or two clever men should set themselves up in the University to give infidel teaching. The right rev. Prelate is afraid that even although he has his own choice of the College and the University, though he may select which Head of a College he will intrust his son to, and which Tutor he will put him under for instruction, it will be quite impossible to find any Head of a College or any Tutor who is to be entirely trusted to teach him as he would wish. The noble Marquess fears that we are to have an infidel propaganda of one or two able men that will sweep the religious teaching of the Universities away, and seems to think that we must invent some new test to meet that danger. My Lords, it appears to me that to fight the battle of truth now with these old tests is very like endeavouring to fight a battle between soldiers with the armour of the Middle Ages. These tests are, in reality, far more hampering than helping. There is no question that the atmosphere of truth is freedom, and that it is quite inconsistent with narrowness and exclusiveness. If you will only remove these tests, I, for one, have no fear of what can be done by the Church of England. It could fight its own battles without fear or favour. I have no fear that any infidel propagandism would prevail against the power that will be there to meet it. Nay, I am quite sure that nothing could be better for truth than that that infidel propagandism should have an opportunity to come forward into the open and show exactly what it thinks and to fight face to face. As it is now, what happens with all your religious teaching? There is a perpetual sense in the minds of the learners that they are not really hearing what their teachers themselves believe. There is the perpetual feeling that the teachers are tongue-tied—["No, no!"]—the perpetual feeling that a man is not saying exactly what he thinks. ["No, no!"] I am not at all saying that this feeling is just—that is another matter; but I know there is a kind of suspicion which constantly poisons the teaching of the Universities, simply because there is a feeling that men are not allowed to be perfectly honest through these tests to which they have submitted. Men are frequently found unwilling to speak to each other about religious subjects, because they have a fear that it is not possible to do so with perfect freedom and openness. Thus a most unhealthy reticence or reserve is practised where there ought to be entire plainness and frankness of speech. ["No, no!"] Those who say "No, no!" express no doubt what they feel in regard to their own University; and I am glad to know that what I have described is not the general character of Oxford and Cambridge. But although the general character of these two Universities is still sound and excellent, yet there is this poison creeping into all their life and doing them the most terrible mischief. I hold then, my Lords, that this is not the way to fight the battle. On this occasion let us rather throw aside all those ramparts which have been erected to protect the truth, but which have very often been made the prison walls within which she has languished, and let us call upon religious men from all quarters to come in and bear their part in the battle, in which we should be glad to have their aid. It is said we shall do little to conciliate the Dissenters by admitting them into the Universities. My Lords, I believe we shall do much. Pardon me if I speak warmly of my own University. It is impossible for a man who has learnt much in that University not to feel that no words can express the depth of his affection or the strength of his conviction of her power to extend to others the blessings which she has conferred on himself. And when those now outside of her pale are introduced within it, will they be insensible, my Lords, to what we have all felt so keenly? Will they not be touched with something like the love that we have cherished for our own Universities? Will not that have some effect in softening down their asperities? The sooner we Churchmen invite them to join us the better, for we shall find them, I am quite sure, such allies that there will not be the slightest reason for what I cannot but think the bugbears held up to frighten us by those who advocate delay.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK: My Lords, I regard this Bill not as an attack on the Universities, but as an endeavour to redress a state of things which it is now acknowledged on all hands requires to be redressed. Ever since the year 1854, when you admitted, but very grudgingly, the Nonconformists to a share in the education of the great Universities, this question has pressed upon you to be disposed of. I well remember that the first step taken by my own University, and taken to my great regret, was to narrow the very narrow privileges conferred by the Legislature, by providing that no Nonconformist should enter the University save to receive his education under a clergyman of the Church of England. It has always seemed to me, as it seems now, that one of two things must happen—either that the Nonconformists must be excluded on the ground that the Universities belong entirely to the Church of England, or else that they must be admitted to a real and substantial share of every advantage the Universities possess. Well, how does the case stand at present? Two men side by side receive the same education, employ the same diligence, and obtain the same honours; and you say to them—"You must sign the tests, and then you will find a place open to you of considerable emolument, which generally lasts for life." One of them signs, and the other refuses. But it does not follow that you have got the best man, or that the hand that signs carries with it the heart and the head that thinks and believes; while you have committed an injustice, and failed in your object. I admit that the endeavour to redress this state of things does involve a certain hardship, and shocks the feelings of many. But I find, on the other hand, that there is not one on either side your Lordships' House who has undertaken the question, who does not admit that we must give to the Nonconformists a substantial share in the emoluments of the Universities. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) admits it in the very terms of his Motion; and the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) who opposed the measure last year admitted it, because he suggested that one-half of the Fellowships should be appropriated to Nonconformists. And this suggests to my mind that when the measure appears next year, perhaps in a more severe form, we shall accept whatever it may be that is proposed. Therefore I must either acknowledge that some substantial advantage would arise from acceding to the Motion of the noble Marquess, or else vote against it. I am quite sure, my Lords, that no substantial advantage can follow from sending this question to a Select Committee. We know there is no question in the whole circle of the political field that we understand more clearly—none that comes more home to us. And I do not know why the noble Marquess calls that “sentimentality” which occurs in the 4th clause, when it appears very good argument in his Resolution. That clause provides that the Colleges shall be secured as places of religious education; and what more do you require than that? There are defects no doubt in this measure; but these defects are not to be cured next year by a Committee such as the noble Marquess proposes, but by discussion in Committee of the whole House sitting this year, and while the subject itself and all the arguments for and against it are fresh in our minds. Let us try, my Lords, as a practical question, what will be the result to the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge. The noble Marquess has drawn a terrible picture of a number of persons meeting together and electing a Fellow by a purely intellectual standard. Then what is the use of tests if you are to elect by an intellectual standard? Because the statutes say you are not to elect by such a standard, but that those who are to be elected must be fitted by religion, by learning, and by morals. If that injunction be systematically ignored, what is the use of restrictions? Besides, in all the Colleges half of the Fellows are clerical, and does the noble Marquess imagine that these gentlemen, with clergymen at their back, will elect persons who will turn the Universities into places of infidel education? What, then, is the use of tests?—because all these clerical Fellows have been tied up as strictly as possible by tests at the time of their ordination. My Lords, let us take a more practical view of the change proposed. For my part, I do not welcome it—nobody who has lived in Oxford, as I have done, is likely to do so; but we must take a practical view of it, and I must say I do not believe that the change that will be wrought in the Universities will be very considerable. There is as great a divergence of opinion in Oxford at this moment as in your Lordships' House. The tests have not succeeded in keeping out revolutions of thought in Oxford, and the abolition of tests would not increase those revolutions. My Lords, I will not trouble you at greater length. I am connected with Oxford as Visitor of one of its Colleges, and as having lived a great part of my life and spent all my happiest days there. It is the birthplace of my children, and the place where I hope they will be educated, and I would not inflict an injury on a University for which I entertain so strong a feeling of affection. But I am convinced, my Lords, that things have come to this—that the wisest and most prudent, as well as the most just course, is to pass some Bill at present, and not by means of illusory promises to defer to a future day, amid acrimony and irritation, the settlement which must surely come, and to which I foresee that your Lordships will one day accede.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion?—Their Lordships divided:—Contents 83; Not-Contents 97: Majority 14.

Then it was moved, To insert the words of the Amendment.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he would offer no opposition. The noble Marquess had sketched in his speech the principles on which he would found his securities, and his Bill would probably be in accordance with them. He would offer no further opposition, but would say
 Not Content to the Resolution.

Then the said words inserted.

Then it was moved—

“That a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the best mode of giving effect to the foregoing Resolution.”

EARL GREY said, that before this Resolution was agreed to he asked their Lordships to seriously consider what advantage was to be derived from the course proposed. Opening the Universities to Dissenters might be a good or a bad thing—in his opinion, it would be for the happiness of the Church; but if their Lordships proceeded upon the assumption that the admission of Dissenters required to be guarded by certain precautions, as regarded religious instruction, he asked them, as reasonable men, whether to refer the question to a Select Committee was a probable mode of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion, as to what those safeguards ought to be?
 If safeguards were necessary—and if they could be devised—would it not have been in the power of the noble Marquess, who held a high position at Oxford, to have consulted with the leading menbers of that University, and to have devised some measures which would have accomplished his object? Those measures he could have placed before the House. Was it because he was unable to devise safeguards that he asked their Lordships to send the subject to a Select Committee? And did the noble Marquess think that a Committee, composed of men of various and clashing opinions, with no scheme laid before them, would be likely to form a correct notion of what safeguards there ought to be? He thought the appointment of a Committee would be an idle, not to say a mischievious, step; and he trusted that his noble Friend (Earl de Grey and Ripon) would give their Lordships an opportunity of expressing their opinion on this part of the question.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not wish it to be understood that he had no recommendation to propose, but he would rather have a scheme which was approved by a Select Committee than one which was only suggested by himself; and, further, he desired that there should be placed on record, by means of the testimony of witnesses, the grounds on which the Select Committee made their recommendation. If he brought forward a proposition on his own authority only, he would not have those strong and valid reasons with which he would be furnished by the Report of a Select Committee, and the evidence of the witnesses whom they examined.

EARL GRANVILLE said, in the course of this debate he had heard many remarkable speeches for and against this Bill; but he was bound to say that up to that moment he had not heard a single argument in favour of the plan of referring this question to a Select Committee, which his noble Friend (Earl Grey) had so strongly denounced. What was this Committee to inquire into? Was it proposed that the Committee should inquire whether infidelity existed now in the Universities, and to what degree — and whether doubts, discussions, and extreme opinions prevailed at Oxford? Or would the Committee inquire into what tests could be suggested? The noble Marquess had not told their Lordships what new test he thought it would be wise and expedient to offer to the Committee; and did he really mean to invite them to appoint a Select Committee to consider certain clauses of the Act of Uniformity, on which every educated man, both in and out of the House, had already formed his opinion?

EARL RUSSELL said, the measure appeared to him an ingenious device to separate what the noble Marquess called the Protestant Dissenters from the great body of Nonconformists. Now, if he had any knowledge of Protestant Dissenters, he believed that no such bribe would be accepted. The noble Marquess might frame a test with that object; but he felt convinced that the Dissenters would never enter the Universities under such degrading conditions.

THE BISHOP OF LLANDAFF said, that in her very wise regulations for the government of Trinity College, Cambridge, Queen Elizabeth included an oath for the young men appointed to scholarships, probably in order to protect them from being embarrassed by the doubts and difficulties that were then rife. It simply required a declaration on the part of these young men that they embraced the Christian faith and preferred the written Word of God to things that were unwritten. A Select Committee might adopt some such test, which would admit all orthodox Nonconformists, whom all were anxious to admit, but would exclude those who had no creed at all. He hoped their Lordships would agree to the appointment of a Committee, in order that it might be ascertained whether some simple acknowledgment of the Christian faith would not answer the object the noble Marquess had in view.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, all that the proposed Committee could do had been done already; information had been given, and the subject was thoroughly known. He remembered a case where a noble Duke obtained a Committee on a Bill; but after a few witnesses had been examined he went out of town, and the Bill was thus conveniently shelved. He wished to know, therefore, whether the noble Marquess would stick to his Committee after he got it?

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN said, he had the honour of being the Visitor of Colleges in both our Universities and also of the greatest public school in England and the world—the Royal foundation at Eton of King Henry VI. Consequently he had a public duty to perform towards those institutions, and he must express his strong conviction that the subject of the safeguards for religious instruction and worship in the Colleges of our Universities ought to receive a sifting inquiry at the hands of a Select Committee. He held in his hand a communication he had received from the head of a College in Cambridge, who had occupied that position for 23 years, who, in the course of 22 years, had thrice been Vice Chancellor of that University, and had displayed great ability in the administration of academical affairs, and had proved his disinterestedness by declining the highest dignities in the Church of England. The writer declared—

“The Bill speaks of safeguards for the maintenance of religious instruction and worship in Colleges; because it does not allow such Fellowships as are now restricted to clergymen to be held by laymen, or by persons who are not members of the Church of England; but the fact is that in some of the Colleges at Cambridge very few of the Fellows are required to take Holy Orders; and, therefore, if the Bill become law, a very large majority of the Fellows of the Colleges might be non-Churchmen, including Jews, Mahomedans, and even avowed Deists and Atheists. Besides, in all the Colleges the obligation to Holy Orders rests only upon College statutes, and these College statutes at Cambridge,"—and 'the same, my Lords, is the case at Oxford with the consent of the Visitors,—“may now be altered at any time by the Queen in Council on the petition of a portion of the Fellows; so that there would be no safeguards whatever, if the Bill become law. Also, by Clause 5 of the Bill, one of the provisions of the Act of Uniformity—namely, Clause 13—is repealed; and, consequently, any religious or anti-religious services might take place in the College chapels generally. The College statutes at present require the daily performance of Divine service according to the forms in use in the Church of England, but they do not prohibit any other. I will not believe that such a provision as this can become law; if it should become law, there would be a precedent for using the parish churches and cathedrals in England for Popish Mass, or for any other rites and ceremonies.”

Such was the language of that distinguished person. He believed that the supposed religious safeguards in the Bill would prove illusory and worthless. This showed the need of careful examination into the subject. It would be the duty of the Select Committee to provide adequate securities. His right rev. Brother (the Bishop of Exeter) appeared to regard the Colleges and Universities merely as places where gifted young men might gain intellectual prizes and distinctions. He seemed to consider them as existing mainly for the benefit of the few who gain scholarships and Fellowships there. He (the Bishop of Lincoln) looked at them in a different light. They did, indeed, afford stimulants to literature and science, and were greatly to be honoured on that account. But their noblest function was to be seminaries of sound learning and religious education for the English nation, in the principles of the English Church. He spoke in the interest of parents when he expressed his belief that safeguards were necessary to prevent the Colleges being made schools of scepticism or seminaries of superstition. It might be said, perhaps, that this was the language of exclusive bigotry; but he would remind their Lordships that one of the most arbitrary monarchs who ever sat upon the throne of England used the abolition of tests as a means of introducing Popery into both our Universities. King James II., professing a zeal for toleration, and for the abolition of all religious tests and subscriptions, sent a Popish Bishop to be President of Magdalen College at Oxford, and to Cambridge a Benedictine monk; and let their Lordships remember who the persons were who, at that time, the year 1686, came forward to maintain the tests and religious safeguards of the Universities and Colleges. Were they intolerant bigots? Surely not. One of the foremost among them at Cambridge was a person whose name shed the brightest lustre on the science and philosophy of England and the world—the immortal Isaac Newton. Unless adequate religious securities were maintained, the youth of the country would run the risk of being brought under the influence of unbelievers, or of those whose seductive arts lead them into another Church. He therefore earnestly supported the proposal of the noble Marquess.

The Bishop of Lincoln

TRAMWAYS BILL—(No. 194.)

(The Earl of Kimberley.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had given Notice of an Amendment which he proposed to move on the Report, extending the term of the concession to be granted to promoters to a period not exceeding 63 years, at the end of which term the tramway was to be given up in a good condition to the local authority. The information at present possessed upon the subject of tramways did not warrant the conclusion that they would be an unquestionable success; indeed, the Report which had been made to the War Department upon the subject of road-traction engines showed that conveyances of that kind would very soon come into general use. The Report to which he referred stated that an omnibus was now being constructed with india-rubber wheels, to carry 65 passengers, and could be easily adapted, both in size and power, to carry a whole company of infantry, and run over the road at from six to ten miles an hour, at a cost of wear and tear, including depreciation of plant, of 2*d.* per ton per mile. This would be a great competitor with the tramways, and the promoters of such schemes should bear in mind what a formidable rival was likely to come into competition with them.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was not prepared to offer any opinion on that part of the Report to the War Department to which the noble Lord had referred; but he thought that the fact that a large number of persons were willing to invest their money in tramway schemes, and were anxious to carry them out, was sufficient justification for granting them Parliamentary powers.

House in Committee.

New clauses added, one authorizing the Board of Trade to issue a Provisional Order, under certain circumstances, authorizing the construction of a tramway where the local authority refuse their consent; the other authorizing the promoters of any tramway, which shall have been opened for traffic for a period of six months, to sell their undertaking to any person, corporation, or company, or to the local authority of the district.

Further Amendments made.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 204.)

BENEFICES BILL—(No. 130.)

(The Duke of Marlborough.)

COMMITTEE. ORDER DISCHARGED.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that this Bill had passed the other House of Parliament with singular unanimity, having been accepted generally on both sides of the House. Since, however, it had been read a second time he had heard grave objections to it expressed by several noble Lords on that and the other side of the House, who represented to him that its main provisions ought to form the subject of a special inquiry. Under such circumstances, and in deference to the opinions thus expressed, he should propose to discharge the Order for going into Committee; and, early next Session, he should move for the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry on the matter.

LORD ROMILLY, referring to the observation of the noble Duke that the Bill had passed through the House of Commons with singular unanimity, said, he had no doubt of the truth of that statement, notwithstanding that the measure might be open to grave objections. Everyone who had had much experience of the House of Commons must know that it was a common practice in that House to pass a Bill through it without consideration, relying upon their Lordships to throw it out if it were an objectionable measure. From his own experience in the Lower House he declared he had heard it frequently said—"We will not go into this Bill as it takes up too much of our time. The Lords will be sure to throw it out if it be not a fit measure to enact." That was a practice that he believed was going on at that very day. He recollected Mr. Joseph Hume saying on one occasion—"Do not let us trouble ourselves with this Bill. The Lords will consider it, and if there be any difficulty involved they will have the assistance of the Judges, who are more competent than we are to remove it." The unanimity of the other House of Parliament in passing a Bill was rather a compliment to the vigilance and judgment of their Lordships than a reason for the adoption of the measure by that House.

LORD CAIRNS said, he was informed by some noble Lords who entertained objections to the Bill that, in consequence of its being moved at a very late hour of the night in the House of Commons it was passed without consideration.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, the noble and learned Lord was mistaken, for it was at a Morning Sitting of the House of Commons that the Bill was passed.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, as there was a strong feeling in favour of the measure, he hoped the noble Duke would not lose sight of the subject that Session.

Order for Committee discharged.

CATTLE DISEASE (IRELAND) BILL.
(The Lord Dufferin.)

(NO. 171.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>d</sup>."—(The Lord Dufferin.)

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he did not want to obstruct the progress of the Bill; but he thought it was one which their Lordships should not allow to pass the final stage without further inquiry. The Bill had passed through the other House without receiving any discussion; and the second reading had been agreed to in their Lordships' House, and the Bill had passed through Committee without, so far as he remembered, a single word of comment. Now, he thought that if their Lordships had been aware of the nature of the measure, it would not have passed those stages without opposition. Its provisions seemed to have been drawn up entirely in the interests of the Irish cattle exporters, and all provisions against the importation of disease with the cattle had been ignored. Very careful regulations had been laid down guarding the importation of cattle into Ireland, but none with regard to exportation from Ireland. He had, therefore, placed some Amendments on the Paper by which he proposed to remedy these defects. Competent judges had declared that Irish cattle were subject to a great many diseases, and he thought it of importance that the exportation of those diseases should be guarded against as far as possible; and, therefore, he considered it only fair to England and Scotland that these Amendments should be introduced. Clause 2 required that cattle brought into Ireland should be provided with hay and water. No doubt, those regulations were very good; but there were no corresponding regulations in respect to cattle exported from Ireland; and, therefore, he proposed to introduce an Amendment into the clause to supply that omission. Again, large powers were given by the Bill to the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit cattle entering any Irish port from England or Scotland if he thought fit; but there was no analogous power whatever given in regard to the exportation of Irish cattle into England or Scotland. He, therefore, would propose an Amendment, to follow Clause

5, providing that cattle should not be shipped from any Irish port without a certificate as to their sound condition from the inspector of the port. Pleuropneumonia had been spread in this country by the Irish cattle brought over to Liverpool, Glasgow, and other places. Unless some such Amendment as he suggested were adopted, the owners of unsound or diseased cattle in Ireland would have every inducement to get rid of them by exportation to England and Scotland. He should be sorry that anything he might propose should have an injurious effect upon Irish landlords, but he did not believe the Amendments he should propose would have any such effect.

EARL SPENCER protested against the general attack made by the noble Earl on Irish cattle. He had never seen any proof that the Irish cattle were inferior to English or Scotch, or had more disease among them than any cattle moved from one part of Great Britain to another. He had no objection to the two first Amendments, but he opposed the third—the certificate system—as being wholly unnecessary. It would be unjust to bind down the Irish cattle trade by the severest restrictions by Act of Parliament—especially seeing that the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council of Ireland had ample power to issue such regulations as in their discretion they deemed requisite. The Bill now before the House put the Irish cattle trade in precisely the same position as the English trade was placed by the consolidated Act passed last year, and it would provide proper safeguards against cattle disease both in Ireland and in Great Britain.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, it was not denied that there was disease among the cattle of Ireland now, and the introduction of this very Bill itself was some evidence of this fact. Why, then, should they not insist on the insertion of provisions which would prevent its spread to England and Scotland? He ventured to say, notwithstanding what had been said by his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, that Irish cattle had brought disease to Scotland to a very serious extent. The noble Earl said that he had ample power by an Order in Council to deal with all cases of cattle disease. Why, then, had the noble Earl not exercised those powers?

EARL SPENCER said, he had meant to say that the Bill before the House would give him ample powers.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: The necessity of granting those powers was a good reason why this Act should be passed, and why it should not be confined to Ireland alone. The Bill would not, no doubt, place Ireland in a worse position; but how would it affect England and Scotland? That was a question worthy of consideration. He could not see what sound objection could be taken to the certificate system proposed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie). It was in the interest of England and Scotland that there should be some such provision. The Amendment of his noble Friend was a very reasonable one; and, if he took the sense of the House upon it, he should vote with him.

LORD TALBOT DE MALAHIDE observed that the most diseased animal he had ever had he had imported direct from Scotland.

LORD DUNSANY hoped the House would not support the Amendment. The interests of the manufacturing population of Lancashire and West Yorkshire were quite as much concerned as Irish interests, and if the people of those districts were able now to buy meat at a reasonable price, it was owing to this—that there was some grass growing in Ireland, while there was none in this country. Pretty nearly every Monday's market at Liverpool was stocked by 3,000 or 4,000 head of Irish cattle, and three or four times that number of sheep, and did the noble Earl mean that for every one of these 4,000 cattle and 16,000 sheep a certificate must be obtained not only that they were sound, but that for a period of three months preceding they had not been in the way of any contagious disease? No veterinary surgeon could certify on view of the animal that it had not been for three months in the way of contagion.

Amendments made, Clause 2, page 1, line 24, after ("Ireland") insert ("or shipped from any port in Ireland to any part of England, Wales, or Scotland").

Clause 5, page 3, line 35, after ("Ireland") insert ("or ship or attempt to ship from any port or place in Ireland to any part of England, Wales, or Scotland").

An Amendment moved, after Clause 5, to insert the following Clause:—

"Any person sending cattle from Ireland to England or Wales, or Scotland, must produce a certificate to the inspector at the port of embarkation that they have not been affected with pleura-pneumonia, and have not been in contact with cattle affected with pleura-pneumonia for at least three months previous to the date of their embarkation; and the inspector shall require the production of such certificate in every case in which cattle are sent from Ireland to England, Wales, or Scotland."—(The Earl of Airlie.)

PRAYER BOOK (TABLE OF LESSONS) BILL—(No. 202.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY again called their Lordships' attention to the fact that they were called upon to recite as a fact that the approval of Convocation had been given to the changes proposed in the Bill. What authority had the House for such a statement? No authority—no evidence had been produced to show that the approval of Convocation had been received by that House. As to other matters in the Preamble evidence had been given. For instance, they were told that Commissioners had been appointed by Her Majesty to inquire. There they had the fact that a Commission had been appointed. He thought the information should be extremely precise and official when they inserted any statement in the Preamble of a Bill.

Amendments made.

MAGISTRATES IN POPULOUS PLACES (SCOTLAND) BILL—(No. 143.)

(The Earl of Airlie.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>."—(The Earl of Airlie.)

LORD COLONSAY said, the Bill recited that it was expedient that the senior police magistrates of towns and populous places in Scotland which were placed under the Police of Towns Act should be placed in the same position with regard to the county as the Provosts of Royal and Parliamentary burghs; and the Bill proceeded to provide that the chief magistrates of such places should be ex-officio Justices of the Peace and Commissioners of Supply for the county in which those places were situated; and as any number of contiguous villages might be combined together for the purpose of the Bill, if any portion of those places extended into two or more counties the magistrates would become Justices of the Peace and Commissioners of Supply for those two or more counties. That seemed to be a novel mode of creating magistrates; it was quite unprecedented, as far as he knew, and deserved the attention of Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, the proposal had been approved not only by the present, but by the late Lord Advocate; it had been submitted to persons on both sides, and no objection had been taken to it.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>a</sup>; an Amendment made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

ROYAL RESIDENCE IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the desire generally expressed in Ireland that there should be a Royal residence in that Country, Her Majesty's Government will propose to Parliament this Session a grant to purchase a suitable residence there for His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have upon a former occasion—I think more than once—conveyed to the House that they are very sensible of the importance of the question of the personal relations between the Royal Family and Ireland. They still remain sensible of the importance of that question, and it will not escape their attention at what they may think the proper time. We do not intend, therefore, to make any proposal to Parliament during the present Session of the nature stated by my hon. Friend.

THE VIRGIN ISLANDS.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all Correspondence or Papers relating to the Cession by this Country to Spain of Crab and Passage or Culebra Islands, in the Virgin Group of the West Indies, which took place about the year 1863; and, if he will state whether any, and if so what, consideration was received by this Country from Spain in exchange for those two Islands?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that for many years the Sovereignty of those two small islands was in dispute between this country and Spain. In 1863, after an elaborate inquiry into the respective titles of the two Governments, the title of Spain was recognized. The correspondence on the subject extended over many years, and he did not propose to print it; but as his hon. Friend represented private interests in the matter, he was at liberty to read over the Correspondence, and his course then would be to consult the Foreign Office, whether these private interests could be recognized by the Spanish Government. In answer to the second Question, he had to state that no consideration was received by this country for the transfer of these two islands.

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY said, he wished to know whether any communication has passed between the Colonial and the Foreign Office in reference to this matter?

MR. MONSELL said, he presumed that at the time the negotiation was in progress such a correspondence was carried on; and the result, as he had said, was the recognition of the title of Spain.

PARLIAMENT—CONDUCT OF BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, if in lieu of adopting the proposals of the honourable Members for East Surrey and Leicester, now before the House, he does not think the business of the Session would be more effectively performed, as well as the health and the patience of Members less tried, by the introduction of the ten minutes time principle, by which a no longer period for speaking would be permitted to any Gentleman other than a Member of the Government, an ex-Cabinet Minister, or the proposer of a Bill or Motion; and, whether it would not be advisable to curtail the right of initiative in Legislation now belonging to private Members, by necessitating the previous submission of their Bills to a Committee to be elected by the House, and which should decide as to the expediency of their introduction, or the contrary?

MR. HORSMAN said, he must interpose on the point of Order, believing that the practice of putting Questions to the Ministry was degenerating into a mere means for the expression of opinion. He apprehended that the object of putting Questions to Ministers was to elicit information on facts of which they were officially cognizant, or as to transactions for which they were officially responsible. Nothing of an argumentative or controversial character should be introduced; and, indeed, he believed it was a rule of the House that in putting a Question hon. Members should not be allowed to use an argument or express an opinion, and, therefore, they were equally disqualified from requiring from the Government such an expression. His hon. Friend (Sir Henry Hoare), however, was transgressing the Rules of the House in putting a Question in which he invited opinions from the Prime Minister. If the Question were put an answer must be allowed, if even it were an hour long, and by moving the adjournment of the House it was then open to any hon. Gentleman to answer the arguments of the Prime Minister. He wished, therefore, to submit to Mr. Speaker whether his hon. Friend was not out of Order in putting this Question?

MR. SPEAKER: It will be convenient that I should remind the House of the Rules which exist with regard to Questions. Questions may be put to Ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs; but in putting such Questions no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except such as may be necessary to explain such Question. Now, in looking at the Question of the hon. Baronet, it appears to comprise not less than six Questions. First, he asks the First Lord of the Treasury whether, "in lieu of adopting the proposals of the hon. Members for East Surrey and Leicester," he will not adopt another course. That is one Question. Then he asks the right hon. Gentleman whether the business of the Session would not be more effectively performed in another way. That is a second Question. The third Question relates to an ex-Cabinet Minister, the fourth to the proposer of a Bill, the fifth to the proposer of a Motion, and the sixth is whether it would not be advisable to curtail the right of initiative in legislation belonging to private Members: all matters of opinion, all open to argument. It is perfectly true, as has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman), that these Rules have been made for the purpose of excluding from Questions matters of opinion and argument which are fit for debate. In my opinion the Question of the hon. Baronet is not of such a kind as to come within the Rules of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, I shall act in the spirit of the decision you have just delivered if I say that such matters as those involved in the Question of the hon. Baronet, relating as they do to the despatch of business in this House, had better be raised in the form of a proposal for a Committee of the House to consider its arrangements for the despatch of business.

BRAZILS—THE ROCAS SHOALS.

QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the numerous shipwrecks which have from time to time occurred on the Rocas Shoals, and whether it is the intention of the Board of Trade to cause any representations to be made to the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of the Brazils as to the desirability of lighting or otherwise guarding this dangerous reef?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, in consequence of the recent loss of the ship Mercurius on the Rocas Shoals, and the report of her survivors as to the traces of very numerous wrecks there, and looking also to the fact that vessels going round the Cape of Good Hope make a more westerly course than formerly, and approach more nearly to these shoals, the Board of Trade have, through the Foreign Office, made a representation to the Brazilian Government in the hope that a light may be placed on these shoals.

IRELAND—STATE OF THE COUNTY OF MAYO.—QUESTION.

MR. G. BROWNE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, having regard to the present peaceable state of the County Mayo, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to relieve the people of that County from the expense of maintaining an extra police force?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that in the month of March, a large number of the magistrates of the county Mayo met together, and unanimously agreed to apply to the Government for an increase of the constabulary force under the powers which they possessed by statute. Many of them wished for a larger force; but they were unanimous in asking for 150, one-half only of which could by law be charged to the county. The Inspector General of Constabulary had not been able to supply more than 116. The state of the county Mayo had very much improved since March; but it would be quite premature at present to decide on any withdrawal of that force.

IMPRISONMENT OF A CHILD FOR FISHING.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has caused inquiry to be made as to the truth of a statement which has appeared in the public papers to the effect that a child of twelve years old has been sent to prison for taking fish out of the River Avon of the estimated value of two pence by the magistrates sitting at petty sessions in the county of Warwick?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he had made inquiries on the subject and found that the facts were not exactly as they had been stated. It appeared by the certificate which had been forwarded to him, that according to the statement of the father the boy was not a child of 12 years of age, but would be 17 next September. He was fined by the magistrate in what could not be called an exorbitant sum—namely, 1s., but the costs amounted to 13s. for fishing in private water. The magistrate, in the exercise of the discretion he possessed, might no doubt have reduced the latter, more especially as the clerk was paid by salary and not by fees, and so no injustice could have been done to that officer. Although it was a discretion on the part of the magistrates, he (Mr. Bruce) regretted that so severe a sentence as 10 days' imprisonment should have been imposed for so slight an offence.

INDIA—EDUCATIONAL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State has received any reply to the Despatch addressed to the Government of India on the 2nd July 1868, on the subject of the Educational Service in India; and, if not, whether His Grace proposes to take any further steps in the matter?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to my right hon. Friend I have to say that we have not had an answer to the despatch about which he asks; but a despatch will probably go to India tomorrow, forwarding for final consideration a revised table of precedence, in which the position of educational officers is materially improved.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: But with regard to the other matters mentioned in the despatch?

MR. GRANT DUFF: We have heard nothing; but the attention of the Government of India might be again called to them.

THE STEAMSHIP "CHIEFTAIN."

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty or the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware that the steamship "Chieftain" (lately the "Mutine" corvette of the Royal Navy) belonging to Messrs. Robertson and Co., Cornhill, City, was entered out at the Custom House on the 7th of April, took on board a general cargo in the West India Docks for Yokohama, Japan, and on the 11th of May last sailed from London; that when going down Channel she was on the 16th, from bad weather, obliged to put into the port of Plymouth; that while there she was searched by an officer of Her Majesty's Customs and an officer of the Royal Navy, her papers twice examined, and her Captain requested by the Collector of Her Majesty's Customs not to leave without his permission; that during the night of the 16th an iron-clad war vessel was moved down and anchored outside the "Chieftain," apparently with the intention of preventing her from going to sea, and that the "Chieftain" was detained nearly all next day; if so, will he state why this vessel was searched and her crew and captain disturbed at Plymouth in the prosecution of a lawful voyage, as the Admiral and the Customs authorities there and the Commissioners of Customs here refuse to give any satisfactory answer to those concerned; and, is the Government prepared to make any compensation to the owners of the "Chieftain" for the expenses and detention and loss of time thereby incurred? He wished further to ask whether the Customs authorities were not on board the vessel, in discharge of their duty, almost every day for four weeks?

MR. OTWAY said, in reply, that he would endeavour to answer the Question with a due regard to what had recently fallen from the Chair. It appeared that the Chieftain was sold to Messrs. Robertson, who at the time of the purchase asked that they might also be allowed to buy her armament, and, the fact becoming known at the Foreign Office, representations were made, and the armament was not sold with the vessel. Shortly afterwards information was received at the Foreign Office that the vessel was proceeding down the river, armed, and it was thought proper to make inquiry respecting the character and destination of an armed vessel leaving this country when she again touched at an English port. Therefore, upon the arrival of the vessel at Plymouth, inquiry was made as to her destination and character, and when it was found that one of the partners of the firm owning the vessel was on board her, inquiry immediately ceased. No doubt these proceedings might have occasioned some inconvenience, but there was no unnecessary detention; and the inconvenience, such as it was, might have been obviated if the parties who purchased and despatched this armed vessel had communicated with the Foreign Office and had made known the country for which she was destined. It would be obviously impossible to carry out the Neutrality Laws of this country if armed vessels belonging to private persons were to be permitted to leave the country without inquiry as to their character and destination.

MR. MELLY said, he wished to ask if the Foreign Office was aware of whom the vessel had been purchased, and where she was going to?

MR. OTWAY: So far as he was aware, the vessel had been purchased for the Government of Japan, and had already passed the Suez Canal, en route for Yokohama.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask whether the hon. Gentleman was not aware that the vessel had lain four weeks at the docks taking in her cargo?

MR. OTWAY said, he had been informed that her cargo consisted principally of Armstrong guns—an additional reason for an inquiry.

CANADA—RED RIVER SETTLEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. M'ARTHUR said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether or not it is true that the Government of the Dominion of Canada have set apart one million four hundred thousand acres of the richest land in the Red River Settlement for the half-breeds of that territory, and under what conditions and for what reasons such appropriation has been made; whether his Excellency the Governor General has assented to such a proceeding; and, whether the Colonial Office is in possession of any information relating to this matter; or if any Correspondence has taken place between the Governor General of Canada and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, he will object to communicate such information, or to lay such Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that by the 31st section of the Acts of the Canadian Parliament power had been given to appropriate a portion of the territory, to the extent of 1,400,000 acres, for the benefit of the families of the half-breeds, under regulations to be made from time to time by the Governor General in Council. The selection of the lots were left to the Lieutenant Governor. The Governor General had assented to what had been done. No Correspondence had taken place between the Governor General of Canada and the Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs.

CANADA—THE VOLUNTEERS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR WALKER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government has taken, or is about to take, any steps to mark its sense of the zeal and gallantry displayed by the Colonial Forces during the recent disturbances on the Canadian frontier?

MR. MONSELL: Sir, Her Majesty's Government, immediately upon receiving information with respect to the conduct of the Canadian Volunteers, addressed a despatch to the Governor General of Canada expressing—what I am sure was the feeling of the House and of the country—their sense of the spirit, bravery, promptitude, and energy exhibited by the Volunteers during the recent disturbances on the frontier. They had further addressed a letter to the Governor General of Canada asking him whether there are any officers to whom he would recommend that the Order of St. Michael and St. George should be awarded. No answer has yet been received; but I can assure the hon. Member Her Majesty's Government are anxious to mark in every way they can their sense of the gallant conduct of the Canadian Volunteers.

METRIC WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether the Government has received an invitation from the Government of France to send Representatives to a Congress of Nations to be assembled at Paris for the purpose of procuring for each nation metric standards of weights and measures, and of comparing and verifying the same with the original metric standards deposited at Paris; and, whether he can inform the House what nations have accepted this invitation, and whether Representatives of Great Britain have been appointed by Her Majesty's Government to attend the Congress?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: In reply, Sir, to the hon. Member, I have to state that the Government received a short time ago an invitation from the French Government of the nature to which he adverts. As the use of the metric system is in some sense legalized in this country, it has been thought proper to accept the invitation of the French Government, and three gentlemen have been appointed to represent this country on the Commission—namely, Professor Airy (the Astronomer Royal), Professor Millar, and Mr. Chisholm (the Warden of the Standards). I understand that 22 countries, in all, have accepted the invitation of the French Government, including all the European States, the United States, and others.

ARMY—COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the General who is to succeed Lord Straithnairn as Commanding in Chief in Ireland is to be sent there with reduced pay and allowances to those usually given to officers commanding in chief in that country; and, whether, if so, he is supposed or expected to continue to keep up that state and position which has hitherto been maintained by his predecessors as becoming the head of Her Majesty's Forces in Ireland, and who from time to time is usually nominated one of the Lords Justices of that Kingdom?

MR. CARDWELL replied that the pay and allowances of Sir William Mansfield would, he apprehended, be precisely the same as those of Lord Strathnairn.

IRELAND—POOR LAW INSPECTORS. QUESTION.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the facts set forth in the Annual Reports of the Poor Law Commission for Ireland laid before Parliament in the years 1869 and 1870, to the effect that the operation of the Act passed in 1868 (31 and 32 Vic. c. 74) extending the powers and duties of the Poor Law Inspectors in Ireland, has imposed additional labour on those officers, and has considerably increased their personal expenses, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to accede to the application made by the Poor Law Commissioners, and both by the late and present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in favour of an improved scale of salary for the Poor Law Inspectors?

MR. GLADSTONE replied, that the question of increasing the salary of the Poor Law Inspectors in Ireland had been under the consideration of the Treasury, and that the Treasury had hitherto made a negative reply. The question had, however, been re-examined recently in connection with matters to which the noble Lord had adverted, and the answer of the Treasury would be very shortly made known.

IRELAND—DIOCESAN REGISTRIES. QUESTION.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government have taken, or are about to take, any steps for the purpose of preserving such of the records, deeds, and documents now in the Irish Diocesan Registries as may not, in conformity with Clause 47 of the Irish Church Act of last Session, be transferred to the Church Temporalities Commissioners?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, in reply, that the Question of the hon. Member was one of considerable interest, and it had received, and would continue to receive, every attention from the Irish Government. His hon. Friend knew there was one large and important class of documents—those connected with the Church property—which would be transferred along with the Church property to the Church Temporalities Commissioners. Another large and important class would be transferred to the new Court of Matrimonial Jurisdiction. There was a residue of documents of various kinds on which he was not able to speak authoritatively; but the question of their disposal deserved, and would receive the careful consideration of the Government.

ARMY—PROMOTION.—QUESTION.

SIR EDMUND LACON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Why the promotion as successor to Brevet Major M'Pherson, Captain 17th Foot was granted to a Lieutenant of the 39th Foot, who, promoted to the rank of Captain, is transferred in the same Gazette to the 17th, over the heads of seven Lieutenants of the 17th, all of whom were his seniors?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the Treasury authorized certain unattached promotions on condition that in each case the promotion was attended by the absorption of a supernumerary of the same rank. Captain M'Pherson was promoted to an unattached majority; but there was no supernumerary captain in his regiment. Lieutenant White was about to become by purchase the junior supernumerary captain in the Army, and he was therefore transferred from the regiment in which he would have been a supernumerary to fill the vacancy occasioned by the promotion of Captain M'Pherson.

METROPOLIS—SOUTHWARK PARK. QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the Deputation from Inhabitants of the Borough of Southwark, which was recently received by him, Whether he has taken any steps with a view to prevent the erection of buildings in Southwark Park?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, that the Question related to a matter of considerable importance. Under the Act of 1864, the Metropolitan Board of Works purchased, at the expense of the ratepayers of the metropolis, 60 acres of land, and they proposed to sell 16 acres as building land in order to recoup themselves for a portion of the expense, which would amount in all to £100,000. The inhabitants of Southwark protested against that proceeding, alleging that the part of the land proposed to be taken was much frequented by the people, and that, owing to the peculiar shape of the Park, the proposed erection of houses would not only curtail it, but materially diminish the value to the public of the remaining portion. His own individual opinion was in favour of open spaces, as large as possible, being maintained, as lungs for the crowded population of the metropolis, and if any action of his could possibly secure such a result, that action would be taken; but the only step he could take was to bring the matter under the consideration of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. If the hon. Member thought it desirable that further steps should be taken in the matter, it would be open to him to call the attention of the House to the subject.

ARMY—EXPENDITURE.—QUESTION.

LORD GARLIES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, in reference to his reply on the 7th instant, as to the apparent discrepancy between the estimated amount and the actual expenditure incurred on the Army Votes for the past year, Whether he can explain the nature of the items of expenditure upon repayment included in the gross estimate, as given in the Estimates for this year, which he explained to have been omitted in the net estimate, excluding such expenditure last year; and, whether he can see any reason for the gross estimate to be given in the one case and the net in the other, considering that they are both designated under the same title of "net amount," after deducting estimated extra receipts and repayments to the Exchequer, on page 4, headed "Statement showing the aggregate amount of the services contained in the Estimates for the three years ending, &c.?"

Mr. Locke

MR. CARDWELL: I am sure, Sir, the noble Lord has no other object but to obtain the information which I shall be most happy to give. I have the details in my hand, at his service. The largest item in the list is that of clothing. The alteration in the mode of statement has been made to correspond with an alteration in the form of the Army Account recently made under the direction of the Treasury.

INDIA—CIVIL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, If any explanation can be offered of the reasons which have induced the Civil Service Commissioners to select as a successful candidate in the last competitive examination for the Civil Service in India, Mr. Borooah, who appears according to the evidence afforded by the regulation of the Calcutta University, and the date of his entrance examination to that University, as specified in the Calcutta Gazette, to have been disqualified by his age from becoming a candidate on that occasion?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the Secretary of State for India in Council has neither the power nor the wish in any way to interfere with the absolute discretion of the Civil Service Commissioners, who are the sole judges of all such questions as that which has, it appears, arisen in the case of Mr. Borooah. They have just proposed to us that a certificate from the chief local authority in India should be held conclusive as to the ages of natives of India, and should be required by them in all cases; but we can only give advice and facilitate the carrying into effect of their arrangements. They make and interpret their own rules, and we have every reason to be satisfied with the results of their action.

PARLIAMENT—NEW REFRESHMENT ROOMS.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to adopt the plan for new refreshment rooms which has been altered from the plan of Mr. Barry of 1869, and with any and what modifications; and, whether it is not to the advantage of the Public Service that this altered plan, which interferes materially with important architectural features of the Palace, should be prepared and executed by a competent architect, in accordance with the Second Report of the Committee of the House of Lords? He would also beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury the other Question which stood in his name, Whether he will fix a day for proceeding with the Civil Service Estimates, Class I.?

MR. AYRTON: Sir, as the Question of the hon. Gentleman, although addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury, relates to the business of the Office of Works, I have to state that it is the intention, I believe, of the Secretary of the Treasury to lay on the Table of the House in a day or two the Estimates for the special service of the Houses of Parliament. That Estimate will embrace the plans which have been submitted by the Office of Works for consideration to a Select Committee of the House, and unanimously approved of by them, and which I trust will lead to the convenience and comfort of hon. Members. The hon. Gentleman is pleased to say that the plan is altered from Mr. Barry's plan. Well, the plan is not Mr. Barry's, but one prepared by the officers of the Department of Works. The plan relates both to the House of Commons, and in a small degree to the House of Lords. The House of Lords, undoubtedly, in their first Report, took great exception, in an architectural point of view, to some statements I had made. They combated my views at considerable length; but on reflection they presented another Report, in which they acquiesced in my views, and the critical affair that arose between myself and the House of Lords is, therefore, at an end. With regard to details, as I shall have to explain the Estimate when proposed it would not be right that I should now do so; but I can assure the House that the plans have been prepared entirely to meet the convenience of the House, on which Members will be enabled to form an opinion, and, perhaps, a better opinion than any architect however distinguished.

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the second Question of the hon. Gentleman, I may state that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War has been prepared for some time to go on with the Army Estimates; but, in order to meet the convenience of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), the Army Estimates will not be taken to-morrow. The Civil Service Estimates will be taken; but not Class I.

CIVIL SERVICE—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATION—CLERKSHIPS IN THE HOME DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will state the reasons why he has adopted a course different to the majority of his Colleagues, and has recommended that first appointments to clerkships in the office over which he presides should not be obtained by open competition?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, the number of clerks to which the Question of the hon. Gentleman refers is about 20, so that on an average, less than one vacancy occurs every year. My reasons were practically the same as those which influenced Lord Clarendon in arriving at a similar conclusion. No inconsiderable portion of the duties required from the clerks being of a confidential nature, requiring some guarantee of personal honour and trustworthiness, as well as of the intellectual attainments secured by the competitive examination, I did not think myself justified in relieving myself from the responsibility of making a personal selection of the candidates for examination.

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA.

QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am at all times unwilling to press Government unnecessarily for information with respect to our foreign relations; but, in the present critical state of affairs, I feel bound to ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite, Whether it is in his power to make any communication to the House respecting the misunderstanding which appears unhappily to exist between two of Her Majesty's principal allies?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I regret I have to say that I must ask the right hon. Gentleman and the House to be satisfied with a very brief statement on the present occasion. We have, Sir, no specific intelligence to convey to Parliament of a nature to satisfy the natural and universal desire of the country to hear that all differences in connection with the candidature of Prince Leopold for the Throne of Spain are completely at an end. However, I can state that the communications between France and Prussia on that subject have not been brought actually to a close, and I need scarcely add we shall continue to do all that depends upon us for the removal of difficulties and the continuance of peace.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I am sure my right hon. Friend will be glad of the opportunity to state—and the House will listen with interest and anxiety to his statement with reference to what is reported to have fallen from the Minister of Foreign Affairs in France, and was repeated yesterday in the Constitutionnel—that the Government of France in the course they were pursuing had the sympathy and moral support of every Government in Europe. I am sure my right hon. Friend will be glad of the opportunity of stating whether, as regards the Cabinet of Great Britain, that statement is correct?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I can only say, in reply to the very natural Question of my right hon. Friend, that I do not think it would be for the public interest that I should enter into details on the particular subject to which he has referred; but this I may say, that Lord Granville has addressed a communication to Paris on the subject of that declaration to which my right hon. Friend refers.

ARMY—THE MITRAILLEUR. QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE OECIL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, with the view to its introduction into the English service, any steps have been taken by the Government to ascertain the effect of the engine of war called the Mitrailleur, which has been lately adopted and highly approved by the French military authorities; and whether it is true that a Select Committee is now or has been sitting to inquire into other descriptions of the same firearm, and, if so, how soon their Report may be expected?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, two mitrailleurs have been purchased; one from America, called the Gatling, and the other from Belgium, called the Montigny. They have been partially tried, and returned to the inventors, at their own request, for some improvements. One has been returned to us, the other not. A Committee has been appointed, and experiments will shortly be resumed. The French instrument is of the same kind.

(Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 11th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, after Clause 31, to insert the following clause:—

(Payment of chairman).

"The school Board for London, and the school Board for any other district, the size of which in the opinion of the Education Department justifies the payment of a chairman, may pay to the chairman of such Board such salary as they may from time to time, with the sanction of the Education Department fix."

The right hon. Gentleman stated that he did not propose that it should be necessary that the chairmen should be paid, but it would be well to give the school Boards the power to so pay them. He had no doubt that in London it would be impossible to work the Bill without having a man of first-rate ability as chairman, and one who would be in a position to give up his whole time to this question. If so, he must be paid.

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought this clause was one of a very doubtful character. If they paid one chairman of a Board they must pay the whole. It ought to be limited to certain defined conditions, for there was no doubt it would add considerably to the expense of the school Board, and would be an additional obstacle to the working of the Bill.

MR. HIBBERT said, he thought it was just as necessary to pay the chairman of a Board of Guardians as the chairman of a school Board. He would suggest that, at any rate, this principle should be limited to London.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, if there was to be only one school Board for the metropolis the time of the chairman would be so much taken up with his duties that it would be impossible to get anyone to take the office unless he was paid. But he agreed with the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) that the principle should be limited to the metropolis, for if chairmen were paid in the rural districts shopkeepers or retired tradesmen would be candidates for the office. But if the office was not paid the district would be likely to obtain a man of some private means, who would accept the office from the interest he took in the cause of education.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would not press the clause against the will of the House. He was still of opinion that there was some large towns where it might be desirable to pay the chairman of the school Board as well as in London; but if the opinion of the Committee was that it should be limited to the metropolis he would not object.

Words from "London" to "Chairman" struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought it desirable, in order to ensure the safe working of the Bill, to give the Education Department the power of dissolving the school Boards, and proposed after Clause 57, to insert the following clause:—

(Dissolution of school Boards).

"Where the Education Department are of opinion that in the case of any school district the school Board for such district are in default, or are not properly performing their duties under this Act, or that for any reason it would be expedient for the interests of education in such district to have a new Board elected, they may by order direct that the then Members of the school Board of such district shall vacate their seats, and that the vacancies shall be filled by a new election; and after the date fixed by any such order the then members of such Board shall be deemed to have vacated their seats, and a new election shall be held in the same manner, and the Education Department shall take the same proceedings for the purpose of such election as if it were the first election; and all the provisions of this Act relating to such first election shall apply accordingly."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU objected to the vagueness of the expression—

"Or that for any reason it would be expedient for the interests of education in such district to have a new Board elected."

It would be sufficient to give the Education Department the power to dissolve a Board in case the Board refused to perform their duties or offered any obstruction to the conduct of education.

VOL. CCLII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. COLLINS said, he thought some means should be taken to provide against the arbitrary exercise of this power by repeated dissolutions of the same Board.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would consent to the omission of the words referred to by the noble Lord (Lord R. Montagu).

MR. HENLEY said, he objected to the clause because it gave the Educational Department the nomination of the school Boards. There was nothing to prevent it toties quoties from dissolving the Boards. This was a strong power to take, and which would not be tolerated in the guardians of the poor. If the Government had it in their power to dismiss without appeal any school Board, he thought there ought to be good reasons why they should exercise it.

MR. HIBBERT observed, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite need not fear intrusting the Education Department with these powers as they had already conferred upon them by the 12th clause powers far more extensive.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he must press upon the Committee the necessity of conferring this power upon the Department; but to prevent the power being abused would propose the addition of words requiring a report of the cases in which this power had been exercised to be made to Parliament annually.

Words omitted.

On Motion of Mr. W. E. FORSTER, the following words were added:—

"The Education Department shall cause to be laid before both Houses of Parliament in every year a special report stating the cases in which they have made any order under this section during the preceding year and their reasons for making such order."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

(Inquiry into complaint of religious teaching.)

"If any teacher in a school provided by a school Board shall, during the ordinary school hours not specially appropriated under Clause 7 for instruction in religious subjects, teach systematically and persistently any particular religious doctrine, or shall otherwise act in violation or disregard of the provisions of this Act, the school Board shall, on complaint made in writing to them by the parent of any scholar hear the complaint, and inquire into the circumstances; and, if the complaint is judged to be reasonable, shall take all necessary steps for preventing the recurrence of the matter complained of; and any parent who shall feel aggrieved by the decision of the school Board on such complaint, shall be at liberty to appeal to the Educational Department by a memorial signed by such parent together with three ratepayers."

[Committee—New Clause.]

The clause was taken almost verbatim from the Endowed Schools Act of last year, and he thought it was a necessary consequence of previous legislation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not disagree with the hon. and learned Gentleman in the object he wished to attain; but he did not think by this clause he would attain it. Instead of strengthening the hands of the Education Department for the purposes aimed at, the clause would weaken them.

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought the clause would facilitate the action of the Education Department, since it would bring the facts to the knowledge of the Department.

MR. PEASE said, he had withdrawn a similar Amendment, finding in the Bill as reprinted provisions which effected this object.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CORRANCE moved to leave out Clause 23, and insert the following clause:—

(Payment for children in receipt of parochial allowance.)

"The school Board shall pay the whole or any part of the school fees upon behalf of any child whose parents shall be in receipt of any parochial allowance, or for any child left chargeable to any person other than its parents; and such payment shall not be deemed to be parochial relief within the meaning of any Act for the maintenance of the indigent poor, either to the child or its parents in such case."

He did not mean to say that the education of pauper children was wholly unprovided for; but the provision for their education was extremely small. The Commissioners in 1866 reported that a very large proportion of them were utterly destitute of education; for though the existing laws gave power to educate them, the law was not complied with, and the Commissioners went on to say that the best remedy would be to make the law compulsory. He believed that that was the state of things at the present time. His objection to the 23rd clause of the Bill was, that it left the matter optional, and not compulsory, with the guardians; but the guardians had never yet acted upon the law, and he feared that they never would do so unless compulsion was brought to bear upon them.

Mr. Hinde Palmer

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he had put upon the Paper a clause bearing upon this large and important question; but, after the discussion which had already been held, he should withdraw it, and he commended his example to the hon. Member (Mr. Corrance), because he was satisfied that in principle this was a matter which belonged to the administration of the Poor Law and not to education, and it would be better to postpone it until a distinct Bill could be brought forward to deal with it.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY moved the insertion of the following clause after Clause 26:—

(Enforcement by school Boards of the Industrial Schools Act.)

"It shall be the duty of every school Board within whose district there is a certified industrial school to put in force, as far as possible, and, if necessary, by an officer of its own, the fourteenth section of the Industrial Schools Act; and the magistrate before whom neglected children are so brought may, if he think fit, send such as have a living parent or guardian to the industrial school for instruction only during the day; and the school Board may pay fees or grant pecuniary aid for the education of any neglected children whom they may cause to be sent to an industrial school.

"Industrial schools to which a school Board shall contribute, and to which other contributions will, under the foregoing Clause, thereupon cease to be made, and industrial schools established by a school Board, shall be subject to the Education Department; and with respect to them, whenever the Secretary of State is named in the Industrial Schools Act the Education Department shall be understood; and the Inspector of such industrial schools shall be the same Inspector as is appointed to inspect other public elementary schools in the same district."

He hoped the Government and the Committee would accept a portion, at all events, of the Amendment, and that before long they might have a considerable change introduced in the Industrial Schools Act, so as to make it correspond with this new educational system of the country. He wished it to be provided that where industrial schools existed they should be made use of; and, further, that the magistrates who committed children to them might commit them as day scholars and not as boarders in certain cases where those neglected children had a surviving parent or guardian. He also wished to provide that these schools, like the other schools under the school Board, should be supported by the same rates and under the same Educational Department. This clause was objected to, he knew, by the managers of the industrial schools; but the objection was simply urged against the present conduct of the Education Office by managers who disliked its interference, and wished to retain unchecked control. There could be no material objection to taking publicly-aided schools from under the Home Office, and placing them under the control of the Education Department. On the contrary, there was every reason of uniformity, of system, and economy for placing all national schools in the national school Department. If that Department needed altering, alter it.

Mr. LIDDELL said, he thought it would be wise to follow the old proverb and "let well alone." The clause was objected to by the managers of the industrial schools, who felt that it would be very unwise to hand over the discretionary powers which they possessed to another set of authorities who knew nothing whatever about the schools, and who would find it exceedingly difficult to carry out those powers with beneficial results.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, there were great and almost insurmountable difficulties in the way of the Education Department undertaking the care and supervision of these children, and also in the way of allowing children to be sent to industrial schools simply as day scholars. Nor would it be wise to compel the school Boards to put the Industrial Schools Act in force. The Government could not assent to the insertion of any regulation binding or even suggesting to the school Boards the adoption of that course. The question was a very difficult one, and though it might be met in amending the Industrial Schools Act, it had no place in this Bill. It might, however, be of advantage to give the school Boards power to appoint officers to put the Industrial Schools Act into force if they chose to do so, and he therefore proposed the following new clause in lieu of the one proposed by the right hon. Gentleman:—

"Every school Board may, if they think fit, appoint an officer, or officers, to enforce any bye-laws under this Act with reference to the attendance of children at school, and to bring children, who are liable under the Industrial Schools Act (1866) to be sent to a certified industrial school, before two justices in order to their being so sent, and any expenses incurred under this section may be paid out of the school fund."

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE agreed with his right hon. Friend in endeavouring to make industrial schools more efficient than at present; but he thought it would be wrong not to lay down the principle that detention in such schools was a punishment, for otherwise there would be no answer to those who asked why such an expensive education should be given to the children of dishonest parents. That detention in such schools was penal, or quasi penal, was proved by the way in which discipline was enforced under the Act: insubordination or absconding were punished by consignment to a reformatory, or by imprisonment. Again, it was considered of great importance that children should be kept away from their former associates. But if ordinary day scholars were sent to an industrial school to mix with the children who were detained there, the discipline of the establishment would be interfered with, and the day scholars might be corrupted by their associates. These schools had no wish to be under the Education Department, their work not being education properly so called, but industrial training; and as the children there were committed by the magistrates, the Home Office seemed to be more appropriate, and it was quite a mistake to suppose that any penal stigma attached to the children after leaving the schools in consequence of that. The expenses of industrial schools were very much heavier than those of other schools, and they could not be saddled upon the rates. Under all the circumstances of the case it would be better to leave well alone, although the proposal of the Vice President would enable school Boards to put the law in motion, and would carry out his right hon. Friend's object to increase the efficiency of industrial schools.

Mr. COWPER-TEMPLE said, he thought that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Adderley) would be a serious injury to the industrial schools. The essence of the reformation carried out in these schools depended on the schools becoming the home of the children, and a permanent home influence being exercised in them. If children were admitted as day scholars the result would be contamination, and the spread of evil associations. Besides that, the opinion of the managers of industrial schools was almost universally against the proposal.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, the children received into industrial schools were not criminals, but only children who had no visible means of subsistence. Criminal children were sent to the reformatories. He was, however, ready to take all he could obtain, and would accept the offer of the Vice President, looking forward with confidence to the operation of the clause.

MR. T. HUGHES joined in the protest against the assertion that industrial schools were schools for criminal children. The general rule was, that the children admitted should be destitute children not convicted of crime.

New Clause (Sir Charles Adderley) negatived.

New Clause (Mr. Forster) agreed to.

COLONEL DYOTT moved the insertion of the following clause, after Clause 40:—

"The Education Department shall make no order to direct that any parish shall be united to another parish for the purpose of forming a school district if such union be opposed by any number of ratepayers in the parish proposed to be united, being rated to the poor rate upon a rateable value of not less than one-half of the whole rateable value of such parish."

There was no new principle in the clause, for it had been recognized over and over again by the Government in the course of this Bill. What he proposed was to give the ratepayers in a parish a more powerful voice in the management of their own affairs, particularly before their parish was united to any other parish for the purpose of forming an enlarged school district.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not, consistently with justice, accept the clause, for they had already provided that union should only take place after inquiry, and after hearing those parties in parishes who made representations against such a step. Following the suggestions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), he had on a previous occasion stated that words should be put into Clause 43 for this purpose. If persons who worked land in a parish worked outside of it, would it not be manifestly unfair that such a parish should not pay its proportion to the rate for the instruction of the children of parents whose labour lay naturally within its borders?

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, there might be a town in which there was a great deficiency of education; and near it a strictly agricultural parish, the property of one landlord, in which there had been always school accommodation maintained by the landowner and the clergyman, and it would be a great hardship if the latter had to pay for the education of the former. This would lead to agitation and discontent; and he therefore hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept the clause of his hon. and gallant Friend.

SIR GEORGE GREY declared that the adoption of the clause would be fatal to the operation of the Bill in the agricultural districts in the North of England, where there were ecclesiastical parishes for the most part arranged in townships, each occupied by a single farmer. If those townships were not combined for the purposes of the Bill, the measure would be inoperative in that part of the country, for the clause would allow a single farmer to put a veto on the union of the townships.

MR. COLLINS admitted that certain hardships would arise, but yet he could not support the clause, for there were many townships which were not so in any bond fide sense. He hoped the Vice President would see that real townships with sufficient school accommodation should not be subjected to what would clearly be a hardship.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed that the object in view was not to increase the rate, but merely to spread it more equally over the district. He should be sorry if any feeling was created of town against country; but, for the sake of economy and general convenience, he thought it would be necessary to unite country parishes to a considerable extent. He looked forward to the action of the Department in the union of parishes as one of their greatest responsibilities, and he did not think the Committee would gain in the interests of justice by attempting to prejudice the matter by any general rule. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dyott) would be satisfied with having brought the subject under the consideration of the Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, he would have been very glad if the right hon. Gentleman had assented to some clause to prevent people being married against their will. They might depend on it that if they joined two parishes of which the inhabitants of one were dissentients they would get up what was called a "very awkward resistance." People very often said—"You do not know how awkward we can be if we like." Now, everybody wished the Bill to work smoothly, and he did not know anything which would induce so many people to go against it as taking one parish and joining it to another against the will of one or the other. It would be a great security if some portion of the Bill would guard against this. It was a great thing that people should go willingly, for unless they had the will of the people with them in this matter they would be able to do nothing. They might do a great deal by leading them; but if they wished to drive them they would find that people were like pigs, and when driven went all manner of ways.

DR. BREWER said, he thought it was better to leave the matter to the Education Department, for the union of parishes might conduce to economy by preventing the needless multiplication of schools.

COLWEL DYOTT, in reply, asked why should the state of the parishes in the North of England be considered a sufficient ground for such legislation? Because the parishes in the North of England were divided into townships they were asked to legislate as if all parishes were thus divided. [Sir GEORGE GREY: The township is a parish under the Bill.] In that case they would take their place side by side with the other parishes, and be treated in the same way. It was manifestly unjust that a number of parishes should be rated alike, while the school accommodation was quite different.

Clause negatived.

MR. STAPLETON moved, after Clause 65, to insert the following Clause:—

(Dissolution of school Boards.)

"In case the average attendance of children at school in any school district shall fall ten per cent below the average attendance in other school districts in which the school Board is elected in the same manner as in the district in which such failure in attendance takes place, or in the case of the metropolis or of towns which are not boroughs below the average attendance in boroughs, or in any case below the average attendance in the county in which the district where such failure occurs is situated, the Education Department may dissolve the school Board of the district in which such failure takes place, and order the election of another school Board in its stead; and no member of the board so dissolved shall be eligible to be a member of the new Board unless he shall be expressly exempted from such disability by an order of the said Department."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not accept the clause. If the power of dissolving school Boards upon such grounds were vested in the Education Department, he did not see how they could exercise it.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LAIRD proposed, after Clause 78, to insert the following Clause:—

(Provision for certain districts under Improvement Commissioners.)

"Where any place not situate in the metropolis, or in a borough, is within the jurisdiction of any Commissioners entrusted by a local Act with the improvement of such place, and has under any general or local Act a separate police establishment, and consists of an entire parish or entire parishes, such place shall be a school district within the meaning of this Act, in like manner as if it were a borough and the said Commissioners were the council; but the local rate and the rating authority in such place shall be respectively the poor rate and the overseers."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the proposition was a very natural one for the hon. Gentleman to make; but in its terms it would be impossible for the Government to accept it, for this reason—the constituency of the Commissioners of Birkenhead was a limited constituency—only £10 ratepayers; and to give the election of the school Board to these Commissioners would be contrary to the principle of this Bill, which required that the parents of children should have a voice in the election of the Board. With the leave of the Committee he would state the change in the clause which the Government proposed to make. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that a discussion recently took place upon the question whether the elections should be carried on in the boroughs indirectly through the Town Council, or directly through the ratepayers, as in the country parishes. The Government, on that occasion, did not conceal their opinion from the House that there were strong arguments on both sides, and that they would be willing to be guided by the opinion of the House. He had stated that the Government adhered to the intention originally stated in the Bill, and he still thought that they had done right in proposing to place the elections in the hands of the Town Councils in boroughs, because by so doing they avoided the contention which might attend an annual election by the ratepayers, and be-

New Clause (Mr. Forster) agreed to.

COLONEL DYOTT moved the insertion of the following clause, after Clause 40:—

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not, consistently with justice, accept the clause, for they had already provided that union should only take place after inquiry, and after hearing those parties in parishes who made representations against such a step. Following the suggestions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), he had on a previous occasion stated that words should be put into Clause 43 for this purpose. If persons who worked land in a parish worked outside of it, would it not be manifestly unfair that such a parish should not pay its proportion to the rate for the instruction of the children of parents whose labour lay naturally within its borders?

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, there might be a town in which there was a great deficiency of education; and near it a strictly agricultural parish, the property of one landlord, in which there had been always school accommodation maintained by the landowner and the clergyman, and it would be a great hardship if the latter had to pay for the education of the former. This would lead to agitation and discontent; and he therefore hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept the clause of his hon. and gallant Friend.

SIR GEORGE GREY declared that the adoption of the clause would be fatal to the operation of the Bill in the agricultural districts in the North of England, where there were ecclesiastical parishes for the most part arranged in townships, each occupied by a single farmer. If those townships were not combined for the purposes of the Bill, the measure would be inoperative in that part of the country, for the clause would allow a single farmer to put a veto on the union of the townships.

MR. COLLINS admitted that certain hardships would arise, but yet he could not support the clause, for there were many townships which were not so in any bond fide sense. He hoped the Vice President would see that real townships with sufficient school accommodation should not be subjected to what would clearly be a hardship.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed that the object in view was not to increase the rate, but merely to spread it more equally over the district. He should be sorry if any feeling was created of town against country; but, for the sake of economy and general convenience, he thought it would be necessary to unite country parishes to a considerable extent. He looked forward to the action of the Department in the union of parishes as one of their greatest responsibilities, and he did not think the Committee would gain in the interests of justice by attempting to prejudice the matter by any general rule. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dyott) would be satisfied with having brought the subject under the consideration of the Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, he would have been very glad if the right hon. Gentleman had assented to some clause to prevent people being married against their will. They might depend on it that if they joined two parishes of which the inhabitants of one were dissentients they would get up what was called a "very awkward resistance." People very often said—"You do not know how awkward we can be if we like." Now, everybody wished the Bill to work smoothly, and he did not know anything which would induce so many people to go against it as taking one parish and joining it to another against the will of one or the other. It would be a great security if some portion of the Bill would guard against this. It was a great thing that people should go willingly, for unless they had the will of the people with them in this matter they would be able to do nothing. They might do a great deal by leading them; but if they wished to drive them they would find that people were like pigs, and when driven went all manner of ways.

DR. BREWER said, he thought it was better to leave the matter to the Education Department, for the union of parishes might conduce to economy by preventing the needless multiplication of schools.

COLWEL DYOTT, in reply, asked why should the state of the parishes in the North of England be considered a sufficient ground for such legislation? Because the parishes in the North of England were divided into townships they were asked to legislate as if all parishes were thus divided. [SIR GEORGE GREY: The township is a parish under the Bill.] In that case they would take their place side by side with the other parishes, and be treated in the same way. It was manifestly unjust that a number of parishes should be rated alike, while the school accommodation was quite different.

Clause negatived.

MR. STAPLETON moved, after Clause 65, to insert the following Clause :—

(Dissolution of school Boards.)

"In case the average attendance of children at school in any school district shall fall ten per cent below the average attendance in other school districts in which the school Board is elected in the same manner as in the district in which such failure in attendance takes place, or in the case of the metropolis or of towns which are not boroughs below the average attendance in boroughs, or in any case below the average attendance in the county in which the district where such failure occurs is situated, the Education Department may dissolve the school Board of the district in which such failure takes place, and order the election of another school Board in its stead; and no member of the board so dissolved shall be eligible to be a member of the new Board unless he shall be expressly exempted from such disability by an order of the said Department."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not accept the clause. If the power of dissolving school Boards upon such grounds were vested in the Education Department, he did not see how they could exercise it.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LAIRD proposed, after Clause 78, to insert the following Clause :—

(Provision for certain districts under Improvement Commissioners.)

"Where any place not situate in the metropolis, or in a borough, is within the jurisdiction of any Commissioners intrusted by a local Act with the improvement of such place, and has under any general or local Act a separate police establishment, and consists of an entire parish or entire parishes, such place shall be a school district within the meaning of this Act, in like manner as if it were a borough and the said Commissioners were the council; but the local rate and the rating authority in such place shall be respectively the poor rate and the overseers."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the proposition was a very natural one for the hon. Gentleman to make; but in its terms it would be impossible for the Government to accept it, for this reason—the constituency of the Commissioners of Birkenhead was a limited constituency—only £10 ratepayers; and to give the election of the school Board to these Commissioners would be contrary to the principle of this Bill, which required that the parents of children should have a voice in the election of the Board. With the leave of the Committee he would state the change in the clause which the Government proposed to make. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that a discussion recently took place upon the question whether the elections should be carried on in the boroughs indirectly through the Town Council, or directly through the ratepayers, as in the country parishes. The Government, on that occasion, did not conceal their opinion from the House that there were strong arguments on both sides, and that they would be willing to be guided by the opinion of the House. He had stated that the Government adhered to the intention originally stated in the Bill, and he still thought that they had done right in proposing to place the elections in the hands of the Town Councils in boroughs, because by so doing they avoided the contention which might attend an annual election by the ratepayers, and because, in the large boroughs, at all events, the Town Councils were likely to be exceedingly good bodies for the election of school Boards. But it was impossible to deny that the strength of the arguments against the indirect election of school Boards had been much increased by the changes which had been made in the Bill. Among other reasons, they had decided that the election in the metropolis should not be conducted through the Common Council, and after hesitating to intrust this duty to so distinguished a body as the Common Council in the City, it was difficult to maintain the elections by the Councils in provincial towns. Again, in many large provincial towns—towns with frequently 10,000, 12,000, or 15,000 inhabitants—there were no Town Councils, and in these places the elections would have to be conducted by the ratepayers. They had, too, admitted into the Bill principles which would make it very difficult to apply the principle of indirect representation. They had, for instance, changed the elections from annual to triennial, and there was no doubt that the body electing the school Board ought to represent the feelings of the ratepayers at the time of the election. In Town Councils, however, though there were fresh elections every year, it was only to the extent of a third of the members. The Government had, though with reluctance, come to the conclusion that, having admitted the principle of direct representation in so large a portion of the country, and especially in the metropolis, they were bound to adopt it generally, and, therefore, on the bringing up of the Report, the Government would be prepared to accept this change.

Mr. DIXON said, he hoped that if Government adopted such a clause as that proposed, they would except Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham from its operation. The Corporation of the City of London could not be said to represent the whole of the ratepayers of the metropolis; whereas in the large towns to which he had referred the share in the election of Town Councillors was general.

Mr. COLLINS congratulated the Vice President of the Council upon having come to the determination that the school Boards should in all cases be elected directly, as it was not likely that the men best qualified to act on those Boards would be found in such a turbulent body as a Town Council.

Mr. LAIRD said, he would not press his Amendment after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. MUNDELLA believed that in the large towns the proposed change in the mode of election would deprive the schools of the services of some of the best men. Clergymen and Dissenting ministers would not stand a contest if they had to appeal to 20,000 or 30,000 ratepayers.

Mr. MELLY said, he hoped that the election would not be fixed for the month of November, when the elections for Town Councillors was held, but would be fixed at an earlier period of the year, when they would not be mixed up with political elections.

Mr. CANDLISH said, that direct elections in large towns would be an act of extreme impolicy. Such elections would be attended with religious acrimony, party bitterness, and enormous expense. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider his determination to throw over the Town Councils.

Mr. J. S. HARDY thanked the Vice President of the Council for his intention to make the change. He could assure him that in the small towns there would be no confidence whatever in the school Boards if they were elected by the Town Council.

Mr. WHITWELL deprecated election by the ratepayers.

Mr. WHEELHOUSE believed the change contemplated by the Government would be eminently satisfactory to most large towns.

Mr. BAINES said, these popular elections ran in exactly the same groove, and were managed by the same people. Town Councils would be far more likely to make an honourable compromise between the different parties, political and religious, and would make a more impartial and more intelligent selection than the ratepayers.

Mr. GLADSTONE suggested that they should reserve the discussion of this question till the Report was brought up. The Committee was going to decide presently a question with regard to the mode of election, which had an important bearing on the subject, and it would be eminently desirable that they should postpone the matter upon which they were now engaged until the Report.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. GRAVES rose to move the following clause:—

(Schools on board training ships.)

"A school Board may, if they think fit, with the consent of the Education Department, provide, establish, and maintain a school on board of a training ship for boys not liable to be sent to a reformatory or industrial school, and grant pecuniary assistance to any such school not provided by them; but every such school shall be conducted as a public elementary school."

He wished that the same privileges should be enjoyed by the virtuously destitute classes as were enjoyed by the criminal classes, and that some help should be given from the rates to valuable institutions which were struggling to maintain themselves in various ports. He hoped there would be no objection to giving a power which could only be permissive, and which could only be exercised with the sanction of the Privy Council. He, therefore, moved the new clause with the greatest confidence.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the question had been two or three times before the Committee. School Boards had power to establish schools for neglected children, and there was nothing to prevent these schools being on board ships, if they came within the definition of public elementary schools. That would depend upon the regulations of the Revised Code, and he had already promised that the question should be fully considered in the further revision of the Code. The Department had been left perfectly free by the elision of the definitions which would have excluded the schools referred to. They could not, however, give power to Boards to spend money for other than educational purposes.

MR. GRAVES said, he would be content with the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. NORWOOD, on the same assurance, withdrew a new clause for extending to ragged schools and to schools in orphan homes the operations of the Act.

First Schedule.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved the Amendment in the first Schedule rendered necessary by the acceptance of a metropolitan school Board.

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR GENERAL FORESTER moved, First Schedule, page 27, line 29, after

"Oxford." insert "and Wenlock." His reason for doing so was that the borough was so extensive, being 15 miles in length, and that it included 13 parishes, several of them in different Poor Law Unions. On these grounds he thought the borough should be put on the same footing as agricultural boroughs without municipal councils or corporations, such as Shoreham and Aylesbury. As this was an exceptional case he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accede to the request he made, which had been supported by Petitions not only from Wenlock, but also from most of the parishes in the borough.

MR. BROWN seconded the Amendment, and said that the extent of the borough was 30,000 acres, that it contained a population of 25,000 and that it was impossible for a rate levied upon the whole borough to be spent equally for the benefit of the whole borough. He supposed no other place had so strong a claim to consideration.

Amendment proposed, First Schedule, page 27, line 29, after "Oxford," to insert "and Wenlock."—(General Forester.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was sorry he could not accede to the Amendment. Oxford was put in an exceptional position merely with reference to the rating of the University, and he did not think that the case of Wenlock was so strong or so exceptional as it had been represented to be. It was one of many similar cases, and he did not see how he could depart from the principle of considering a borough a unit. He supposed the place was proud of its position, and it must take the disadvantages as well as the advantages of being a municipal borough. He did not see how they could deviate from the principle he had laid down without sacrificing the borough unit altogether. It must be remembered that they were dealing solely with municipal boroughs and not with Parliamentary boroughs, and it might be that in this case the municipal borough had a large area; but they must take it as they found it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that if the Government had adhered to their original proposal of the election of school Boards by Town Councils, the opposition to the Amendment would have been tenable; but, as they now proposed that the ratepayers should elect the school Boards, he could not see that there was much force in the objection to the proposed Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not accept the conclusion that the question of the body which was to elect had anything whatever to do with considering the borough the unit, or with the area over which the rate was to extend.

MR. GILPIN said, the Government could not accept the Amendment, because he could name a dozen places that were in the same position as Wenlock.

Amendment negatived.

First Schedule agreed to, with Amendments.

On Motion of MR. W. E. FORSTER, New Second Schedule brought up, and read the first and second time.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "held," in paragraph 1 of the Rules (Election by a Council), to the end of paragraph 30 of the General Rules, in order to insert the words "at such time and in such manner, and in accordance with such regulations, as the Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe, and the Education Department may appoint or direct the appointment of any officers requisite for the purpose of such election: Provided, That any poll shall be taken by a secret Ballot."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER admitted the importance of the Amendment of his hon. Friend, and it would be convenient that he should state how the Government proposed to deal with the Schedule and the Amendment. No doubt there was inconvenience in having imparted into this difficult educational question the question of the Ballot. The Government were anxious not to prejudice the question either way as regarded the great principle of the Ballot. But as regarded the question of education, it was thought desirable on the second reading to make it quite clear throughout the country that the votes of parents should be given freely and fairly; and therefore, without prejudging the question of Ballot in the matter of Parliamentary or municipal elections, there were serious reasons for adopting the Ballot in elections of school Boards under this Bill. The Ballot already existed in many bodies similar to those which would have to elect the school Board. Under the Metropolis Management Act the Ballot was part of the machinery, and elections, therefore, were constantly going on in London conducted by Ballot. He had himself gone into the City to see a Ballot for a popular election. It was a contested election for vestrymen, and the Ballot was taken under Sir Benjamin Hall's Act of 1855. There might be objections to the working of the machinery; but it was evident to him that every voter who wished to give his vote secretly might do so. London would probably be the very first place where a school Board would have to be elected, and, therefore, they would have been prejudging the question against Ballot if they had said that it should not be used under this Bill. But then his hon. Friend increased the difficulty by insisting that the Ballot must be secret; meaning thereby that the voter should be obliged to give his vote secretly. He thought they had enough difficulty on their hands without taking on themselves that responsibility. How, then, could they arrange practically for the election of these Boards? They had already agreed to the adoption of the cumulative vote, and they had endeavoured to frame a Schedule containing the necessary regulations. He could not, however, rely on it to meet all the difficulties; and it would be a great convenience if the Committee assented to the proposition of his hon. Friend, giving them the power to make the regulations. On the other hand, he could not expect the House or the Committee to leave this matter with carte blanche in their hands. That would be unreasonable. He, therefore, proposed that the Committee should accept the principle of his hon. Friend's Amendment with this understanding—that the order to be made should be enforced for every election up to the 1st of September next year, but not afterwards unless confirmed by Parliament. In the mean time, the question of the Ballot generally would not be prejudged, and he hoped that by next year it would be finally settled by Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman then stated the alterations which he intended to propose.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE observed that, considering the right hon. Gentleman's desire to get this Bill passed speedily, and, as far as possible, unanimously, through the House, he was astonished at the right hon. Gentleman's audacity in foisting in at the fag-end of the Bill the difficult and perplexed question of the Ballot. This was the more surprising, inasmuch as the Ballot had never yet been a Ministerial question; it had only hitherto been a crotchet of private Members. Such a plan as this was unconstitutional, and he objected to this sort of pilot-balloon measure, which could only have the effect of frustrating legislation on sound and broad principles.

Mr. JAMES objected to the adoption of so important a principle as the Ballot by a side wind and without a fair and full discussion, without which it was unreasonable to expect hon. Gentlemen opposite to yield up opinions to which they held very strongly. He was one of those who had brought themselves, however unwillingly, to believe that the Ballot was a necessity; but he could not deny that there were many and strong arguments in favour of open voting; and in deference to the opinions of those who were adverse to the Ballot, and in justice to the Ballot itself, he objected to this mode of determining this great and radical change. He would suggest an Amendment, authorizing the Education Board to determine the mode of election for 12 months. By striking out the words providing for secret voting, his hon. Friend would render assistance to the cause of the Ballot much more than by taking advantage of the present state of the House.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to know the question really before the Committee. Was it the question of the Ballot?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the question was the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chelsea, which involved the omission from the Schedule of certain passages relating to Ballot.

Mr. HIBBERT reminded the hon. Gentleman opposite that the principle of the Ballot was not, as he appeared to believe, new in this country, because the principle was embodied in an Act passed in 1831, relating to the election of Boards of Guardians, and which provided that on the requisition of five rate-payers, the poll should be taken by Ballot. Considering that there had been upon the statute book for nearly 40 years an acknowledgment of this principle, he thought the Committee might properly adopt it for a year, until the greater measure was passed.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. B. Hope), demurred to the remark made by the hon. Gentleman that the Government were "foisting in" this question.

The intention of the Government to accept this principle had been before the House for weeks, for it was one of the first alterations which the Government agreed to make in consequence of the discussion on the second reading of the Bill; and the discussions had since been conducted on the understanding that the Government intended to accept it, and hon. Members on his side of the House would have a right to complain if they now departed from the principle. The power was only asked for for one year, and surely that would leave the House uncommitted on the question. Under 18 & 19 Vict. vestry elections were by Ballot; and, therefore, unless the voting for school Boards was by Ballot, the Committee would undo that principle in such districts, and the Government would also be departing from the pledge given by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, that when he used the word complained of, he simply referred to the place which the subject occupied in the Bill. He contended that the Committee were put in a false position by this proposal. It ought not to have been made in a Schedule, but should have formed part of the Bill, and then it would have come under consideration earlier in their proceedings. He did not want to alter the status quo in districts where the Ballot now prevailed.

Mr. W. FOWLER reminded the hon. Member that large majorities in that House had pronounced in favour of the Ballot, and if the Government abandoned the principle in the Bill, it would be thought that they had given it up altogether. He hoped the Government would stand firm on this question.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the application of the Ballot in the election of school Boards by municipal corporations, so far from having been before the country for weeks, had only just been before the House, and in the case of municipal corporations it had hitherto been understood that the elections were to be by open voting. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman meant to resist or accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chelsea?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, it had been stated and understood in the discussions weeks ago that the election was to be by Ballot. The Government would accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend with the additional words he had stated, and with the omission of the words "a secret." He asked his hon. Friend to omit these words, because two interpretations were given to them. What he understood the clause to mean was that any election for school Boards held before September 1 of next year should be by Ballot; and it was limited for a year in order that the House should not be pledged upon the general question.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, that if he had thought the Ballot had been mixed up with this question he should not have been found voting for the second reading of the Bill. Nobody expected that in such a measure vote by Ballot was to be introduced, complicating the education question, and separating, by a strong line of demarcation, one side of the House from the other. He had entertained great hopes that the Bill would have gone quietly through the House with the consent and sanction of all parties, for all were alike deeply interested in the education of the people. But they differed on the Ballot, and he would take every opportunity of opposing it, for he regarded it as a most un-English practice. In whatever position a man might be placed when the responsibility devolved on him of choosing another man to fill any office, he was bound to give his vote in the face of day, showing thereby that he voted conscientiously for the best man. He ventured to hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council would reconsider the question. He had proved himself well worthy of the position he occupied, and he (Colonel Barttelot) hoped the right hon. Gentleman, who had conducted the measure in that House in the most conciliatory manner, would not now at the last moment throw into the discussion this apple of discord, which might endanger the ultimate passing of the Bill. It depended entirely on him and on the Government whether the Bill would soon receive the Royal Assent or not. If they waited for another year, and the Ballot was carried—which, however, he hoped would not be the case—then they could adjust its machinery to all other matters, as well as to Parliamentary elections. Mixing up such a question as that dealt with generally in the Bill with the Ballot was unfair to the country, and was characterized by more unwisdom than any proposal which had hitherto been made by the Government.

MR. CAWLEY said, he thought it unfair that, at the end of the consideration in Committee of this important Bill, the question of the Ballot should have been brought forward. The right hon. Gentleman had said the Ballot would be prejudiced if the Bill was passed without sanctioning that mode of voting. That was an unfortunate declaration, for it challenged the opinion of Parliament on the subject. He did not entertain such strong objections to the Ballot as many persons, his feeling with regard to it depending very much on the way in which it was carried out. If it did not secure secrecy and protection for the voter it would become a great nuisance and abomination, and he did not believe that simply by the delivery of voting papers secrecy would be secured among the great mass of the people. In order that the Bill might not be endangered elsewhere, the Ballot should be eliminated from the Bill. In that case the Ballot would be adopted in London and other places where the Ballot at present prevailed, and would be excluded only from places where there was no evidence that it would be acceptable.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he could not help feeling that the good vessel Education was now getting into troubled waters. He denied that there was a general and fair impression in the minds of hon. Gentlemen that the question of the Ballot was to be mixed up with education. This was the real question. Hon. Members opposite had contended that the Education Bill should not drown the Ballot; but he (Mr. Scourfield) thought it was just as likely that the Ballot would drown education.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he would so far consent to modify his Amendment that he would omit the word "secret;" but he must remark that what the hon. Member (Mr. Cawley) had said about there being a Ballot in London now must be greatly qualified, because there was no security for protection, and the people did not care about it, so far as the election of the guardians was concerned. It would be a very different thing in the rural districts where the greatest interest would be felt in the election of school Boards.

MR. HERMON said, that if he voted on the present occasion against the proposal under consideration, he might be supposed to be altogether opposed to the Ballot; but his vote on the Ballot would very much depend on the nature of the Ballot Bill, when it was introduced in its amended form, for he was of opinion that the Ballot, unless it secured secrecy, would do more harm than good. He should not vote for or against the Amendment, but reserve himself on the question of Ballot until he could vote in an independent manner, when the question of the Ballot was brought before the House in its true shape.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the Vice President had made a complaint of the hardship of having incidentally in the Education Bill to decide on the constitution of the government of the metropolis, and also to deal with the vexed question of the Ballot. But the Amendment of which he had given Notice would relieve the right hon. Gentleman of the difficulty so far as the Ballot was concerned. Neither in the country nor in that House was there the slightest wish that the Ballot should be insinuated—he would not say foisted, as that word was objected to—into a Schedule of the Education Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman now told them it had been discovered since the second reading of the Bill there were purely educational reasons for establishing a great code of regulations for vote by Ballot. He had listened in vain for those educational reasons. The right hon. Gentleman said it was of great importance that in the country the parents of children should give their votes freely and fairly in the election of school Boards; but why was this distinction made between the parents of children in the rural districts and those of children in the towns? It was a most unworthy imputation against local management in the rural districts, where they exercised their franchise as fully and freely as the ratepayers in the metropolitan boroughs. He altogether denied that the Ballot was necessary to protect the parents of children in the rural districts. At last the Government had come to an agreement with the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke). There was an amicable arrangement between the two champions of the different kinds of Ballot. The Government accepted the major proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, and he, in turn, with many protestations, yielded his favourite word “secret.” But what did it all come to? That for the first year—the crucial year, when the Boards were to be set up, the Education Department would, all over the country, have absolute power to dictate in what mode these elections for school Boards should be conducted. But at whose expense was the machinery for this noble mode of voting, prescribed by a public office in Whitehall, to be carried out? Why, it was to be carried out at the expense of the ratepayers; and they were told that if they did not, without discussion, examination, or deliberation adopt this vague mode of voting, the general question of the Ballot would be prejudged. Nothing could be more absurd. His own opinion was, that if anything was calculated to prejudice that question it was the very course now being adopted by the Government. He maintained that great expense must necessarily attend the adoption of the principle of the Ballot in the case of the Education Bill. There must be polling places; there must be Ballot machines, such, he supposed, as those to which their attention had recently been called. Each machine of that sort, he understood, was estimated to cost £150. Then, too, unless the whole thing was a mockery and a sham there must be a whole army of assessors, means and men to secure the secrecy of vote by Ballot. All this machinery would have to be provided, and at the expense of the ratepayers—it must actually be paid out of the education rate. Would not this tend to make the rate, which would be sufficiently unpopular, perfectly odious? The Vice President urged them to adopt the Ballot in connection with education, and hoped that the general question would be settled next Session. He did not, however, adduce any argument for adopting such a system in the hasty and unsatisfactory manner that was now proposed. If it was the intention of the Government not to proceed with the Ballot for Parliamentary and municipal elections this year, was not that an argument for not proceeding with it this year in regard to education? Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to tell them that next year he would propose that all Parliamentary elections should be taken by Ballot, but that municipal, Poor Law, and other elections should continue to be carried on as now by open and not by secret voting? If he did not mean that, why introduce the Ballot by this extraordinary side wind, enormously increasing the local taxation of the country? The right hon. Gentleman said that in London, under the Metropolitan Management Act, the election of vestrymen was by Ballot; but the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea said that was a perfectly futile and inoperative mode of Ballot. He would ask why they should follow the analogy presented by the voting in the London Vestries instead of that presented by the voting for Poor Law Guardians. These elections were conducted at an inconceivably small expense and without annoyance or inconvenience to the ratepayers. In the election the other day at St. Pancras, for instance, a parish with 150,000 ratepayers, where 35,000 votes were recorded, and where the excitement was as great as it was at an ordinary Parliamentary election, the whole expenses to the ratepayers was only £213. But, with the plan proposed by the Government, with polling-places, the Ballot-box, and an army of clerks, to secure secrecy, such an election would cost 10 or 20 times as much. He had reserved his opinion with respect to the more general measure which the Government had before the House, because it should be remembered that there was this vital distinction, that while the expense of the Ballot in the case of Parliamentary elections was to be thrown upon the candidate, in the election of the school Boards the expense would be borne by the ratepayers. He could not, holding these opinions, therefore help censuring the Government for endeavouring to force the Ballot upon the ratepayers of the country in a manner never anticipated or expected; and in the interests of the ratepayers, in the interests of the great cause of education, and he would add in the interests of the Ballot itself, he entreated the Committee to reject this proposal.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought that the noble Lord had unduly inflated the magnitude of the question. He had stated that next year would be the crucial year for the formation of school Boards. He (Mr. Forster), however, believed that, with the exception of the metropolis, it was difficult to say whether any school Board would be formed at all next year. The only two cases in which they were sure of such Boards being elected were first in the metropolis, where the Ballot already existed; and secondly, in those districts, which might call at once for them. On the second reading of the Bill the Government, in view of the religious difficulty, felt themselves bound to provide that the election of school Boards in the country should be conducted freely and fairly, and therefore by the Ballot; and accordingly, after Whitsuntide, he gave Notice of Amendments, one of which was the Ballot, and it remained on the Notice Paper from that time to the present. He would remind the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) that it was impossible to allow the law to remain exactly as it now was, because the House had imposed upon the Government the adoption of a new form of voting, the new principle of cumulative voting, and the Government were pledged to make special regulations for carrying out the principle. They must decide whether it should be done by Ballot or not. For educational reasons they pledged themselves to legislate in favour of the Ballot; and they would certainly be prejudging the question if they adopted any other principle, such as that suggested by the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners), and carried out in the elections of the Poor Law Guardians.

MR. CAWLEY said, he did not intend that they should leave the law as it stood, but that they should leave the present mode of voting as it stood by law. He would remind the Committee that the proposal was entirely new, for it had never been proposed that the elections in the large municipal boroughs should be taken by Ballot. It was not until within the last two or three hours he knew that the Government announced their intention on the subject. It was previously understood that the elections should be vested in the Town Councils, and he heard during the dinner hour that the change had been announced by the Government. The Committee should also bear in mind that if only two or three elections were to be held during the next 12 months, there could be no harm in retaining the present mode of voting during that period. This new proposal would introduce an apple of discord which he thought would endanger the passing of the measure.

COLONEL CORBETT said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman, in his anxiety to avoid the great oppression which he fancied would be exercised in rural districts, was preventing a large number of persons from voting who ought to record their opinions in regard to the election of school Boards. In many districts a great number of ratepayers would be unable to vote unless the polling-places were close to their residences. Consequently, either the ratepayers must be put to enormous expense for providing numerous polling-places, or else a large number of people would be unable to record their votes.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had listened with astonishment and dismay to the present discussion. It had been stated that this proposal for the Ballot had been for a long time on the face of the Bill; and, though he admitted this to be quite true, it was obvious that the Committee could not discuss the question until it was brought under their notice. There were surely enough difficulties in the way of the Education Bill; and, as a friend to education, who was desirous to see this measure pass, he asked why, in the name of common sense, the Government should embarrass its progress by a most unnecessary and extravagant proposal. During the last 20 years Parliament had been considering the difficulties of an Education Bill, and during that period there had been repeated battles on the subject of the Ballot. Why should the present measure be complicated by the introduction of a mode of voting which was strongly objected to by many hon. Members—not on party grounds, but on principle? He had always opposed the Ballot on principle, being of opinion that all public functions ought to be discharged openly and in the face of day. He could not conceive any greater unwisdom than the complication of the Bill by unnecessarily importing into it a mode of voting which formed the subject of differences between different classes in that House.

MR. DIXON said, that hon. Members opposite were now doing what they had charged them with doing—namely, throwing impediments in the way of passing the Bill. If the Government were now to recede from the principle of the Ballot, it would render them most unpopular with their party.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, arguments like those used by the last speaker were not calculated to have much influence with those who sat on the Opposition side of the House. The disputes of the Government with their supporters below the Gangway did not interest that side of the House any more than the quarrels of those with whom they were not in the least connected. They looked upon them with amusement and occasionally with contempt; but they were not led thereby to adopt measures contrary to their own principles. He entertained the greatest respect for his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, who had acted with reference to this subject of education in a manner which must do him honour in the eyes of the public, and would not make him so unpopular as the Member for Birmingham seemed to suppose. He was astonished, however, that the right hon. Gentleman should ask the Committee to commit to his hands, or to the hands of any other person, the mode of the election of the members of the school Boards. The Committee was asked to allow the Education Department to determine how the voting should be conducted with regard to a question which would not raise animosities, as the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) thought, but which would furnish a number of posts that would not be much coveted by persons engaged in the political arena. These places would, he believed, be given to and sought by educationists, and not by a clique of politicians, as would have been the case if the election had been vested in the Town Councils. The right hon. Gentleman had stated his views as to the mode of election, and of all the comic means of keeping secrecy, those adopted by the Government in the matter of the Ballot were the most extraordinary. There were to be two nominators and eight seconders for each candidate, and consequently the Government which desired to secure the secrecy of every man's vote insisted on some 500 or 600 persons—as far as the metropolis alone was concerned—declaring their opinions, for, unless they were the greatest hypocrites, they would vote in accordance with the opinions they had declared. However, they would have an opportunity of going into a secret corner and voting against the persons they had proposed or seconded. The Department intrusted with educating the people in moral principles was to inaugurate this system of hypocrisy, treachery, and baseness. He had reluctantly sacrificed many of his opinions in order that the Bill might be carried; but he warned the Government that the question before the Committee was not one of education at all. Having brought in a Ballot Bill, and finding they could not carry it this year, the Government had determined to throw dust into the eyes of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway by offering them the Ballot in a matter with which comparatively it had no concern whatever. He told the Government that if they thought they were going to carry the measure in its integrity with the Ballot in it, they would find themselves grievously mistaken. He had sat upon a Committee which had investigated that subject, and he was prepared for a discussion on it when the proper occasion arrived. This was an invasion of all the principles by which they ought to be actuated. Bills were introduced, read a second time, and carried into Committee, reported, and read a third time. What was the course adopted by the Government in reference to the present Bill? It was read a second time, with no such principle as the Ballot in it at all; but, on the contrary, containing a totally different principle. The Bill went into Committee in the same condition as it was in at the second reading. At the suggestion of several hon. Members the Bill was amended pro forma; but nothing was said about the Ballot at the time. An hon. Member with a powerful imagination had an impression it was in the original Bill; but this was not so. But in the Bill as amended pro forma the Ballot appeared in a Schedule quite different from the one now before the Committee. Thus, the Ballot provision was introduced in Committee, never having been read a first time, and placed in a Bill to which it was wholly inappropriate. If ever there was a case in which the arguments against the Ballot were strong, it was in regard to its introduction in a measure of this kind. It was applied, too, in a perfectly new principle, for the Ballot had never yet been adopted for a cumulative system. He asked, was this a reasonable thing to do in an Education Bill? Hon. Members opposite had been very urgent in their recommendations that the House should divest itself of party feeling and discuss the measure with calmness and moderation, and then, by way of promoting calmness, they had introduced a question which had been agitating the political mind for the last 50 years, and which had nothing to do with the subject of the Bill to boot. He could not discover what were the educational reasons for the Ballot referred to by the right hon. Gentleman; but he wished to remind the Committee of the most important arguments brought before it by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Vernon Harcourt) in respect to the unfairness of a rate. The question of expense was no small element in the consideration of this point in the case of a district composed of 40,000 or 50,000 voters. Which was the cheapest way of conducting an election, to carry the poll to the voters or to oblige the voters to go to the poll? The polling of 40,000 or 50,000 voters by the first process would cost £100 or £200; but if the whole machinery of booths, election agents, and canvassers were introduced, the cost would be more like £2,000, and that would be the beginning of the educational charge upon the rates. He wished to know what would be gained by this. Hon. Gentlemen talked of some extraordinary pressure which was to be put upon the electors; but that was a farce and a folly, a sham and a delusion. No doubt, at some contests pressure would be exerted on one side and on the other, from above and from below, pressure which was perfectly legitimate and beneficial, and pressure which he would reprehend as decidedly as any other; but in the case of the election of these school Boards none of these dangers need be anticipated, for nobody could suppose that these offices would be so coveted that there would be partizan candidates such as appeared at municipal or Parliamentary elections. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) had taunted them with turning against the Education Bill. It was no such thing; they objected to the Ballot, which had nothing to do with the measure, and they objected only to that and to foisting secret voting into a Bill in a way which could only educate the people in hypocrisy and fraud. ["Oh!"] He did not expect hon. Members opposite to agree with him; he simply expressed his views, and he trusted no one would desire him to profess any other opinion but his own. If the Government found any difficulty in passing this Bill, they had the satisfaction of knowing they had brought it on themselves; this difficulty would arise not from any want of support from the Opposition with regard to the educational measure itself, but because the Government had thought it necessary to insinuate into the Bill, at the last moment, principles which had no connection with it, and which if they pressed would inevitably result in the rejection of the Bill itself.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the right hon. Gentleman had made a somewhat heated speech. ["No, no!"] When he had quoted some passages from it he would leave it to the right hon. Gentleman to judge whether the description was not correct, but for the present he would withdraw that remark. The right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech by saying that the disputes of the Government with their supporters below the Gangway did not interest him. He might be permitted to observe that nobody troubled the right hon. Gentleman with any request to undertake that office. It was not at all necessary. Mr. Mill had spoken of the Liberal party as constituting a sort of Broad Church, in which differences of opinion amongst themselves were tolerated, and he (Mr. Gladstone) thought it would be a long time before they had occasion to appeal to anyone sitting on the opposite Benches to undertake an office which no one had a right to intrude upon them. But if the Liberal party habitually tolerated differences amongst themselves, he must take the liberty of observing that there was another party which, though not perhaps so tolerant of them habitually, was exceedingly tolerant of them upon occasions when they thought subjects material to the public interests were involved. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the differences amongst the Liberal party in terms which in other moments he would probably repent. The right hon. Gentleman said that when he saw the differences of opinion between the different classes of persons on that side they were sometimes the subject of amusement to him. That was perfectly fair, and it was some satisfaction to know that if they could not supply the right hon. Gentleman with anything better, they could at least amuse him. But he went on to say that he sometimes viewed these differences with contempt. He (Mr. Gladstone) was bound to say that he hoped the right hon. Gentleman made use of that expression in a period of momentary warmth; because, if that was not so, he must assert respectfully but firmly that that was not a word which ought to be applied by a Member of that House, and still less by one who had held high Office under the Crown, to differences which he might think erroneous. ["No, no!"] At any rate, if hon. Members on the other side claimed that as a proper style of language, in which to refer to any differences of opinion between different sections of the House, he trusted that the claim would be confined to the other side, and would not extend beyond it. The right hon. Gentleman also said that the Government had introduced a Bill with reference to secret voting when they knew they could not pass it. The Government did not deserve that imputation. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to name any Government which had worked harder for the purpose of passing through the House the Bills it had introduced. When the Government had filled the days and nights of this year as it had with subjects of the greatest importance, did the right hon. Gentleman suppose that they were so poor in credit that they required to bring in a Bill on the subject of secret voting for the sake of maintaining their reputation, or that they could stoop to bring in such a Bill with the knowledge that they could not pass it?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood him. What he said was, that when the Government found they could not pass the Bill they had introduced, they adopted this mode of dealing with the question. He did not say that the Government had introduced the Bill with the view of its not passing.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Government brought in that Bill knowing that they could not pass it; but he was glad the right hon. Gentleman had now fully conveyed to him what was his meaning. But he could not help feeling that the right hon. Gentleman also went beyond the limits which were fairly allowable to a Member of that House, when he took upon his own responsibility to assure the Committee that if a majority of this House passed the Education Bill, with a provision as to secret voting, they would find that they were mistaken in expecting the Bill to pass. The right hon. Gentleman might be perfectly entitled to entertain that as his opinion; but he had no title to announce it as a conviction. Therefore, he thought he was justified in stating that warmth of the moment had characterized some portions of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. However, it was much more pleasant to think not of this or that isolated expression, but of the friendly and liberal manner in which the right hon. Gentleman, and those who sat near him, had striven, in all their proceedings hitherto on that Bill, to promote the purpose which they held in common with the Government, even at the expense of many of their individual opinions. He would endeavour to forget the matters of which he had felt it his duty to speak, and address himself to the charges which had been made against the Government by the right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington). These charges were chiefly two. In the first place, it was said they were introducing into the Education Bill a proposal totally inconsistent with education; and, secondly, that the matter which they were thus thrusting into the Education Bill was in the nature of a serious innovation, which hon. Members opposite were entitled and felt themselves called upon to resist to the utmost. He wished to contest both these propositions. There was another point, relating to the amount of discretion to be reserved to the Education Department; but that was a matter which might be easily arranged, and it had nothing to do with the real question at issue. The Government contended that the Ballot was, under present circumstances, closely and logically connected with education. This was a Rating Bill, and it was necessary by it to provide means of election; and thus, by an indissoluble bond, the provisions they were making for promoting national education were interwoven with the absolute necessity of dealing with modes of local election. The Ballot was equally connected with the subject as regarded the history of the case, because it was admitted that in the debate upon the second reading of the Education Bill they declared that they felt it to be absolutely necessary to secure, as far as possible, the personal freedom and independence of the parents in these elections, and to make that consideration paramount in their provisions with regard to the constitutions and the mode of election of the Boards. The pledge contained in that declaration the Government had redeemed by introducing before the month of May had expired the provisions which were now under discussion, and which were intended to give the utmost independence of action to those who elected the Boards. In reply to the allegation that the introduction of the Ballot as the mode of election was an innovation, he would ask, was that statement true? If this was the first occasion on which secret voting was used to carry out a particular purpose, then the objections of the opponents of the measure might be, in a great measure, justified. But this was not the case. There were two laws on the statute book recognizing and justifying secret voting in connection with local and particular purposes. The first was the Metropolitan Local Management Act, where it was compulsory, and the second was the Vestries Act, for the better regulation of vestries, where it was optional, but so optional that it might be demanded by any five ratepayers. Now, when was this Bill passed? Was it a recent innovation—was it the fruit of household suffrage—was it the fruit, even, of the £10 householder suffrage? No; it was in an Act passed in the reign of William IV., but before the introduction of the first Reform Bill, that this innovation which was so greatly condemned by some opponents was introduced. It was impossible, under these circumstances, to look upon the present proposal as an unheard-of innovation, now sought for the first time to be thrust upon Parliament. It was clear that the system of secret voting had already been applied to cases where it was important to secure independence of election for purposes of local government. Here was a new purpose of local government, in which it was most essential that independence of election should be maintained, and, accordingly, Her Majesty's Government had resorted to the method recognized by Parliament before the first Reform Bill as being the best to secure that end. And had there been any extraordinary demand made upon hon. Gentlemen opposite? He confidentially asked them to admit this, that they had reduced to the lowest possible point the claim they made upon them; they felt that with the great question of the mode of taking Parliamentary elections so close impending, they might naturally feel a jealousy which, however, the Parliament of William IV. did not appear to have felt—that they were called upon to give a vote which might afterwards be cited as a precedent against them. But then look at the position of the Government. They must either ask hon. Gentlemen to yield something, or they must make a great, and as they felt, an unnecessary condition themselves. They were dealing with a question in which the independence of the ratepayers was, above all things, the great and paramount object. Was it unnecessary or unreasonable that in such a case they should follow what they believed to be the predominant feeling in the House. They did not object to hon. Gentlemen opposite saying that they were opposed to the Ballot, and that they would resist it in every form. But they did object to much of the language that had been used; to their saying that this was something monstrous—that the House was taken by surprise. Why, the proposition for secret voting was one that had been adopted into the Bill more than two months ago, when he described the mode in which it was proposed that the elections should be taken. When his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council proceeded to carry out the engagements into which they had entered, he naturally adopted without any check the principle of secret voting. But as they came nearer to the point, they felt that it was their duty to make as small a demand as possible upon hon. Gentlemen opposite to reduce their claims to the minimum, and they had therefore introduced that reference to the Privy Council which the right hon. Gentleman opposite described as an additional offence, and they had reduced the limitation as to time. He should not have wondered if a complaint had come from below the Gangway, that the introduction of these provisional regulations was evidence that the Ballot was not to be a permanent measure. The Government asked for the adoption of this principle only in the case of those elections that might emerge in the course of the next 12 months. Then they were told that enormous expense would attend the working of this principle of secret voting. Was it not odd that the unreformed Parliament of 1831 was not terrified by this question of expense? If they were not, why was the present Parliament, that was elected by the free suffrages of the people of England, to be terrified at an expense of which Parliaments less popular and democratic—no, he would not say less popular, were not afraid? The noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) talked of the election for the parish of St. Pancras. Had the noble Lord ever heard the dearness of secret voting complained of? The noble Lord said if that election had taken place by secret voting it would have cost £2,000. What was the noble Lord's authority for that statement? There were thousands of vestries that had been elected by secret voting, and who had ever heard of their being more expensive than on the open system? He thought a great deal of matter had been imported into this question that was quite unnecessary. He did not wonder that they should object to secret voting. It was quite right and fair that they should oppose it. But there were other things that were not so—the language that had been used—the prophecies of failure—the allusions to what would be done in the other House. ["No, no!"] Well, he was delighted to hear the disclaimer; he did not wish to catch the right hon. Gentleman in the use of a word, though he must say nothing could be more distinct than the language that was used. ["No, no!"] If not so, then let them look at the question in itself. It was not of large dimensions, for it was only in rare cases that the power would be used before the time when the definitive judgment of Parliament would be called for. He hoped the House would see that the Government was asking the least concession that would be sufficient for the purpose they had in view, while for that purpose they felt that what they voted for was a paramount necessity. It was in this spirit, whether the sense of the House was to be taken upon it or not, that they viewed it—it was in this sense they voted for it, and they were anxious to show right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side that they appreciated the spirit in which they had striven to deal with this Bill; but if the proposition of the Government was disagreeable to them, it was yet in the mildest form to which they could give it effect consistent with their own pledges.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, he wished to express his regret for having used the word "contempt." He thought it due to the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee to do so. That word did not convey his meaning. What he meant to convey was that he viewed the quarrels to which he referred with amusement and indifference, but not with contempt.

Mr. HENLEY said, he could quite feel after what had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council and also by the Prime Minister, supplemented as it had been by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), what were the circumstances of pressure under which this change had been made. It was impossible not to feel for the position the Government was placed in. But what he wished to observe was this—the time of the introduction of this element of discord—he must not call it new, as the right hon. Gentleman had discovered some old statutes that were drawn on the same principle. He was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman was in any circumstances inclined to look back. But what struck him was the utter misgiving and mistrust with which the Government had introduced this change. As the Bill was first drawn the school Boards were to be elected on the old principle of election, and the Government were then content to trust them, unless there should be some statutory Department to frame the directions laid down for them. But, now that they had introduced secret voting, were they as content to trust them as before? Not a bit of it. Look at the clause passed early in the evening, by which the Government took powers to sweep away the Boards so elected by secret voting, without assigning any reason. They would not trust them; but they took power to sweep them away entirely, subject only to the control of this House. That was what the Government proposed to do with the Boards elected by Ballot—they took arbitrary power to reject them after they were elected. There was not a more arbitrary clause to be found anywhere, and it was only introduced into the Bill at the same time with secret voting. That showed the opinion of the Government itself upon the subject. For himself, he was never fond of secret voting. He hated all secret proceedings; but he thought this showed the mistrust of the Government itself as to the change. If the Government could not trust its own child, with what face could they ask the House to trust it? For that reason alone he should refuse to support this proposition of the Government.

Mr. LIDDELL admitted this was a small matter, but it involved a large principle. He wished to ask the Government what was the necessity for introducing this secret principle into the elections of the school Boards? Its introduction would give an impulse to the movement in favour of the Ballot, for which the country was not prepared. He was not going to discuss the question of the Ballot. The people of England had never looked the principle of the Ballot in the face, and they certainly were not prepared to admit it by the back door. The great argument in favour of the adoption of the Ballot was that it produced tranquillity at elections; but what reason was there for supposing that the elections of school Boards would be anything but tranquil and commonplace occurrences? His opinion was that they would be both commonplace and dull, because the Bill itself was a great compromise. There was no reason for supposing that the freedom of action of the parents would in any way be restrained—that, in fact, it was impossible that any coercion could be practised upon them. To attempt to secure tranquillity by secret voting was a pure myth. He hoped the day was distant when the Ballot would be adopted; but if they were to have it let it be discussed openly and upon its merits. If the voice of the country were challenged upon the subject he was certain the majority would be against it.

Mr. GREENE said, the Opposition had fairly met the Government on the Bill, and they ought not to be called on to admit, on the consideration of an education measure, a principle in no way connected with it, and which they felt to be an evil of the greatest magnitude. If a Parliament of King William IV. was benighted enough to adopt a Bill introducing the Ballot, all he could say was that he much regretted it. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) had lectured the Opposition for what he termed their desire to stop the progress of the Bill. If he (Mr. Greene) represented a borough so dark as Birmingham he should feel he was doing wrong in stopping it for a moment; but he had the happiness of representing a town in which the Bill would not be required, because there they educated every man, from the highest to the lowest. Gentlemen below the opposite Gangway talked when it suited their purpose of raising the working man to the position of an independent member of society, and now they spoke of him as needing the protection of secret voting. He did not want to make a stalking-horse of the working men of England; but he said they gave their votes as independently as any Member in that House. If they wished to lower the moral standard of the country, they would resort to secret voting, which he, for one, hated even in a club, and whenever he adopted it he invariably disclosed afterwards how he had voted. The thing must be checked in the bud; and therefore he hoped that hon. Members on his side of the House would continue that debate and adjourn it. That proposition was, he believed, brought forward merely to please Members below the opposite Gangway. Where the carcass was there the birds of prey gathered together; and he had observed that evening that hon. Gentlemen opposite had been early in their attendance, hoping that there would be a Division, while Gentlemen on his side of the House were at dinner. If they were to have the Ballot, let it be put forward fairly and honestly on its own merits.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he objected to the introduction of the principle of the Ballot into the Bill, and he complained of the Government, in order to propitiate the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) and those below the Gangway, having acceded to it. The Government were about to render the Bill agreeable to the hon. Member for Birmingham by introducing the Ballot into it. He viewed with interest any manifestation of independence on the Government side of the House, and he was glad the hon. Member for Birmingham felt he was in a position to be able to make a bargain with the Government, because it was a revival in his person of the character for independence which that town had hitherto maintained.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, who was opposed to the Bill, was likely to have the best of the bargain; but there was little chance of the principle of secret voting being adopted by the House of Lords. Although the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister professed himself a neophyte with respect to the Ballot, he must remind that right hon. Gentleman that at one time there was no more earnest opponent of it than the right hon. Gentleman, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would forgive him for reminding him that it was the non-adoption of the Ballot by the vestries under the Act of Will. IV. that Lord Palmerston relied on showing how distasteful the Ballot was to the people of England. The Ballot was invariably introduced when the once Radical, but now the Liberal, section of the House was short of a cry. He had seen the question wax and wane, but never persevered in in earnest, and, notwithstanding Mr. Berkeley's annual exertions, the principle had never been adopted. He further objected to the introduction of such a principle into the Bill after it had been read a second time. Once provide the machinery in every parish for taking the Ballot in these minor elections, and they would be told every time the question was brought forward with reference to Parliamentary elections that, as the expense had been incurred, they had better try it. When he saw hon. Members examining those neat boxes that had been exhibited in that House for taking the Ballot, and studying how they might conceal how they gave their votes, he wished hon. Members should be compelled to purchase one, and have it in his own house, so that John the footman, Sally the cook, and Jane the housemaid, might one by one every Saturday use it as a means of expressing their choice of precedent for the ensuing week. The Ballot was a principle alien to the purpose of the measure, and they were perfectly justified in using every means to defeat it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to know how the Chairman proposed to put the Question? The Government accepted the Motion down to the end of Paragraph 30.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the proposal of the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Dilke) was to leave out from the word "held," in paragraph 1 of the Rules (Election by a Council), to the end of paragraph 30 of the General Rules, in order to insert the words—

“At such time and in such manner, and in accordance with such regulations, as the Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe, and the Education Department may appoint or direct the appointment of any officers requisite for the purpose of such election: Provided, That any poll shall be taken by a secret ballot.”

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked for some explanation, as those on that side of the House who wished to vote against the Ballot were in a great difficulty as to how they were to vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, if the words upon which the Question was put were struck out the Committee would be held to have assented to the omission of all the words the hon. Baronet now proposed to omit. The Question would then be put to insert the words which the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea proposed, and it would after that be open to the noble Lord to move the omission of any paragraph down to paragraph 30. On the other hand, if the Committee should refuse to omit any of the words which the hon. Baronet proposed to omit, the Question having been put only on the first words it would be open to the noble Lord or any hon. Member to move the omission of any of the subsequent words.

Question, “That the words ‘on the prescribed day’ stand part of the Schedule,” put, and negatived.

Question proposed, “That the words

‘At such time and in such manner, and in accordance with such regulations, as the Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe, and the Education Department may appoint or direct the appointment of any officers requisite for the purpose of such election: Provided, That any poll shall be taken by a secret ballot,’

be there added.”

MR. BERESFORD HOPE inquired whether it was competent now to move the omission of any portion of the hon. Baronet’s Amendment. If so, he would move that the words from “provided” be omitted.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Committee, in assenting to the omission of the words named, had virtually assented to the omission of all the words the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea proposed to omit. It was now proposed to insert the words of the hon. Baronet, and that Amendment was open to Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to make some verbal Amendment in the hon. Baronet’s Amendment. He would move to insert before “appoint” in line 3, “by order.”

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, after the word “election,” in line 4, to insert “to do all other necessary things preliminary or incidental to such election.”

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked for some explanation of the very vague words which it was now proposed to insert.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, they were intended to give the Education Department power to conduct the few elections that might be necessary between this time and next year.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT wanted to know whether that included any arrangement incidental to election by Ballot called “stuffing the books.”

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not answer the question, as he had never before heard that expression.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the words showed not only how provisional the arrangement was, but how extremely unwise it was for the Government to force this matter. That was an additional reason, if any were required, for resisting, by every means, in their power, this attempt to force the Ballot.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word “election,” in line 4, to leave out the words “Provided, That any poll shall be taken by a secret ballot.”—(Mr. Beresford Hops.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘Provided’ stand part of the proposed Amendment.”

MR. W. E. FORSTER explained, that although the word “secret” still stood in the Amendment, his hon. Friend had assented to its omission.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN wanted to know whether they were or were not going to vote on the question that there should be a poll by Ballot?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the objection taken to the word "secret" was, that it raised the question of the kind of Ballot. A Ballot might be compulsorily secret, or it might not, and the Government did not wish to raise that point. The question that would be before the Committee was, whether the poll should be taken by Ballot or not?

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE asked, whether, if the word "secret" were omitted, the right hon. Gentleman would agree to insert the word "public."

MR. HEYGATE said, he thought the discussion which had taken place would suffice to show that the Government had made a great mistake in introducing this question, because up to that moment the Committee were advancing rapidly and happily to a conclusion; very many Members on his side of the House having sacrificed their cherished opinions for the sake of facilitating the progress of the measure and of arriving at an amicable conclusion on a very difficult matter. It would not be denied that many of them did not see the necessity for so great a change, yet, having sacrificed their opinions, they had now to meet a question which sought, by a side wind, to change the constitution of the country. If the Government wished to arrive at a rapid settlement of the subject they should withdraw that change and fall back upon the old mode of voting, for the change had no connection with the Bill, and its introduction by the Government was an element of discord which might well have been avoided. He trusted that his right hon. Friend, who had throughout the progress of the measure shown such a conciliatory disposition, would again consider this question before pressing it to a Division.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he wished to see the Bill passed, and having on all occasions voted with the Vice President, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had wantonly introduced this subject into the debate. It seemed to him that the Government did not altogether like the proposed Ballot, for they had resolved to suggest that the word "secret" should be omitted. He should like to hear from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) whether the word "secret" was in the Parliamentary Elections Bill, and, if so, whether it was his intention to strike it out of that measure.

MR. JAMES said, he fully appreciated the feelings of hon. Members opposite when they desired that the Ballot should not be made part of the law, still more fully did he understand the feelings of those who wished that there should be a complete Ballot, while he was most strongly opposed to that method of Ballot which was not to be secret. Treating the Ballot as a remedy for an evil, he would accept it or entirely discard it; for if he were sick and a physician sent him a potion he might take it, or he might refuse it, but he could not be right in taking only half of it. The Government asked the Committee to give powers to the Education Boards to employ not a secret Ballot, but one in which it might be disclosed how an elector had recorded his vote. It was against such a method that he protested, and it was admitted that the Committee could not now discuss this question. Hon. Members opposite might easily state their objections to the Ballot; but it was difficult to express opposition to a mode of semi-Ballot, because hon. Members might be unable to show how they wished to alter the law in order to render security unnecessary. He should be unwillingly compelled not to vote on the proposition now before the House, and therefore wished to justify that course.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished to inquire of the Chairman whether, if hon. Members were first asked to vote upon the words "that any poll shall be taken by a secret Ballot," the Government would afterwards be at liberty to propose to omit the word "secret?" That form seemed to him to be exceedingly inconvenient and clumsy, besides which he had a recollection that, when the Committee had once passed any proposition, those who had carried it were apt to say that the House had assented to a principle. He did not wish to hear that said when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to abstract the word "secret," thereby weakening the proposition; and he, therefore, asked whether, if the Committee assented to the proposition now before it, hon. Members would be considered to have pledged themselves on the subject of secret voting?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was not for him to say what interpretation hon. Members should put upon the words of any proposition that was submitted to them. It was now proposed to omit the words "Provided, That any poll shall be taken by a secret Ballot," and the Question he should put was on the first word only. If the Committee negatived that word they would be held to have negatived all the subsequent ones, and to have assented to the Motion of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope). On the other hand, if the Committee decided that the word "provided" should stand part of the proposed Amendment, they would not have precluded themselves from amending the subsequent words, and it would therefore be open to any hon. Member to propose the omission of the word "secret."

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he was anxious that the Government should have one night of calm reflection on the subject now before the Committee in order to decide whether they would take half the potion or not. He, therefore, moved that the Chairman should report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Colonel Barttelot.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could hardly believe that the hon. and gallant Member was serious in his proposition. The Committee had now arrived at the only point which remained for discussion, and if the hon. and gallant Member thought that the Committee might arrive at a decision which was adverse to him, he would have an opportunity of challenging that decision at another stage of the Bill. The Government proposition, which had been before the House for six weeks, had been modified to-night, but modified in such a way as to bring it nearer to the views of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. Under the circumstances, and at this late period of the Session, he thought it would be the duty of the Committee to utterly resist all Motions intended to consume the remainder of the evening and waste valuable time; and he felt confident that, if the Motion was persevered in, the hon. and gallant Gentleman would fail in obtaining the support even of those among whom he sat.

MR. DISRAELI said, he had also supposed that they were on the eve of passing an Education Bill which, on the whole, enlisted the respectful sympathies of both sides of the House. It was remarkable, however, that Her Majesty's Government had been able to excite passions at the last moment. This, he thought, was quite unnecessary. The right hon. Gentleman truly remarked that this plan had been before the Committee for a considerable time; but the right hon. Gentleman had omitted to mention that it had been greatly modified in some of its most important features, and for himself he was bound to say, in respect of the subject now before them, that it was a most unfortunate determination on the part of the Government to ask them to decide on a great principle of politics by a side wind, by remitting to a question which, of all others, widely enlisted the sympathies of all sections and parties in the country working for a common end, another subject upon which, no doubt, great controversy existed. But this measure of education had even to-night, as he had learned to his surprise—for he had thought it was pretty well safe and settled—received considerable changes and modifications; and, under the circumstances, he could not think the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) so ill-timed as the right hon. Gentleman appeared to imagine.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he should move the omission of the word "a" for the purpose of afterwards inserting the words "voting papers." He had voted with his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) night after night, and he could not express how deep was his regret that at the eleventh hour such an unfortunate element should have been introduced. He hoped that no person would be found imputing motives to those who felt themselves bound to take up a position of painful hostility to the measure. He could not support secret voting, as it was contrary to the system which had been the honour and glory of England.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the word "a," in order to insert the words "voting papers."—(Lord Claud Hamilton.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Government would agree with the noble

Lord opposite in omitting the word "a," because for reasons which he had already stated, they proposed to omit the words "a secret." He must be allowed for the sake of his own position, and as having charge of the Bill, to state that while he did not in the slightest degree blame hon. Members opposite in voting against the Ballot, even though limited in its operation to one year, it was hardly fair upon him when they expressed surprise at his now proposing on the part of the Government the Amendment of which he had given Notice six weeks ago, and to which the Government were pledged to such an extent that he should almost have forfeited his personal honour if he had neglected to bring it forward. Seeing that the Committee was now much more full than it had been at an earlier period of the evening he wished to state that the reason why he proposed to omit the words "a secret," was not because they did not intend to secure secrecy, for they intended to secure such a Ballot as would give the fullest protection to the voters from intimidation, but because the hon. Baronet opposite had by a strange construction of the words discovered that they meant a Ballot which must be secret, rather than a Ballot which might be secret. They did not look forward to a sham Ballot, but one that would protect all who needed it in recording their votes. With regard to the particular Amendment under consideration, the Government agreed with the noble Lord's proposal to omit the word "a."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that having, in common with others on that side of the House, supported the Education Bill very cordially for some time, giving up many of their own predilections, and laying aside points of difference at some sacrifice of their own feelings, he felt that they had a just right to be greatly grieved on that occasion. He must entirely demur to the justice and wisdom of calling upon the Committee to decide, à propos of the Education Bill, the great and important question of the Ballot. They were distinct questions, and the former should not have been brought before them in an indirect manner, for they were surprised to a certain extent into that debate. Greatly as he approved of the Education Bill, he yet thought it was so important not to have matters of this weight and character treated incidentally, as had been done in this instance, that he should feel justified in raising any opposition in his power to the progress of the Bill, on account of entirely extraneous matter having been introduced into it.

Mr. BIRLEY said, he fully agreed with the views just expressed by his noble Friend. This was not so much a question of the Ballot as of the confusion into which the Bill had been thrown. The Vice President of the Council had been obliged to leave a most despotic power in the hands of the Privy Council. The Committee ought to have time given it for further consideration of the question.

Mr. R. TORRENS said, on a question of this importance, it was of all things necessary that the Committee should have a clear understanding as to what they were about to vote upon. He therefore called upon the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council to explain to the Committee in a more detailed and distinct manner than he had done what he meant by a Ballot which was not to be secret. He also wished, before he recorded his vote, to have explained to him what possible advantage the Government could expect from a system of Ballot which was not secret. The Ballot was looked upon as a remedy for intimidation, undue influence, and corruption; but how was the desired object to be secured if secrecy were not preserved? By leaving out the words "a secret" the right hon. Gentleman certainly laid himself open to the charge that he had repudiated, that the Ballot proposed would be a sham. He could not support the Government in this matter, unless he were assured that the proposed form of Ballot would protect the voters from intimidation, undue influence, and corruption.

Mr. BRODRICK, who rose amid cries of "Divide," said, he did not think he could be accused of having trespassed unduly upon the time of the Committee or of the House. He entirely concurred with the observations of the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon). His opinion was that the Government had thrown great obstacles in the way of the passing of the measure by their attempt to introduce a principle into voting, which he believed would never receive the sanction of the people of this country.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 157; Noes 228: Majority 71.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the word "secret."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was proposed to amend the proposed Amendment by omitting the word "secret" before "Ballot."

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked what was meant by that Amendment. He understood that the Ballot was intended to protect the voter from the consequences of his vote, and how could it do that unless it was secret?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he wished to utter a word as to the term "secret." His hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens) was mistaken if he supposed that by omitting the word "secret" the Government meant to say that the Ballot could not be kept secret. His right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council had explained several times that evening that the word "secret" was capable of bearing, and in the opinion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) it did bear, the interpretation of limiting the Ballot which was suggested under that clause to a Ballot which was absolutely secret. For himself, he had stated, in bringing in the Bill on Parliamentary Elections, that there were different kinds of Ballot, differing in the degree of secrecy attached to them. It would be very easy to adopt a mode of voting that would secure absolute secrecy, so that whatever might have been the malpractices connected with an election, it could not be discovered in favour of which candidate the fictitious votes had been given. The Ballot which the Government had proposed for Parliamentary elections was one of a totally different character, and admitted of a scrutiny being applied as easily as in the case of an open system of voting. That was the kind of Ballot which the Government would prefer, and they did not wish by any words in that Bill to pledge the House upon so little discussion as it was possible to give the matter that evening to the adoption, even for that limited purpose, of any particular mode of Ballot. Therefore, they now proposed to omit the word "secret;" and, although it appeared to be new to the House, it did not at all follow from the omission of that word that the Ballot should not be secret.

VISCOUNT GALWAY asked the noble Marquess whether the Ballot was to be open?

Question put, "That the word 'secret' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 47; Noes 288: Majority 241.

James, H.
Torrens, R.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, this was not the period of the night, nor was this the time, for introducing the question of the Ballot. He would, therefore, move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir James Elphinstone.)

MR. GLADSTONE reminded the hon. Gentleman that they had not only discussed during nearly the whole evening the question of the Ballot, but they had voted upon it by decided majorities; and as the question was now disposed of, he was not aware that any other Motion would arise. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Baronet would not persist.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he rose at the same time as the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Dilke) for the purpose of moving an Amendment, which would really raise the question. The Committee had just eliminated secrecy from the Ballot. They had now only to go one step further and eliminate Ballot from the voting. The words by which he proposed to do that was by moving to omit the word "Ballot" for the purpose of inserting "the method now in force for the election of guardians of the poor."

MR. DISRAELI: I rise to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister, to consider the position in which the Committee is placed with regard to the proposition before it. In dealing with the education question we had to deal with one of the most difficult of questions—more difficult I believe than the Irish Land Bill, or even the Reform Bill, for all the religious prejudices of every section in the country were enlisted in the discussion. I cannot help feeling that these difficulties were quite enough for even the most ambitious Minister to contend with, and considering the mode in which the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman have been received by the House—that on all sides we have endeavoured to remove obstacles and to facilitate the progress of the Bill, I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have felt it his duty to introduce another element of difficulty, that one of the most disputed points of controversy of the present day should be brought in at the fag-end of the measure, and that there should be the appearance—I hope it is only the appearance—of obtaining the opinion of Parliament upon it in a manner so objectionable. Acquitting the right hon. Gentleman of any intention of that kind, which, I am sure, is foreign to his nature, we find ourselves in this position—We encountered difficulties with regard to the education question which at one moment appeared insurmountable, and when a successful conclusion appears at hand, owing not merely to the ability of the Government in the conduct of the measure, but also to the excellent temper and discretion of the House on both sides, this new difficulty, which I think very much to be regretted, has been brought before us. The right hon. Gentleman must see that his proposition does not please a majority of the House, and the late Division showed that there is a considerable section of his constant supporters who do not approve it. I think, therefore, that in deference to a feeling which cannot be mistaken; considering the critical state of foreign affairs; and, considering also the state of Public Business, and the great desirability that we should now proceed in a manner to show the unanimity of Parliament—the right hon. Gentleman might, with perfect dignity and in a temper becoming a powerful Minister, refrain from pressing further a proposition—which, as I may remind the Committee, was not contained in the original measure—which is an unhappy innovation, and which has produced an unfortunate discord at a time when I with many others believed that a considerable measure of national elementary education was, so far as this House is concerned, about to be brought to a conclusion. Again—though it is not a class of considerations upon which I care to dwell, a Cabinet Minister must recollect the spirit in which this measure will be discussed in "another place." When, therefore, we have to offend many prejudices in this House, and have no doubt many difficulties to encounter, and, as I hope, to surmount in "another place," why introduce into a House almost unanimous upon the general question a matter of political controversy, which has already led to much discord, and which may prepare for us difficulties in "another place" at a period of the Session when it is most desirable that all elements of difference between the two Houses should cease. Sir, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will find it consistent with his duty not to press this question, but allow the elections to be conducted as originally proposed, and, as is usual among the ratepayers, by voting papers or more open voting. Let us have the usual custom of the country, that which was contemplated by the Government in their original Bill, and which, under all the circumstances of the case, will meet, more generally than the one proposed, the views and wishes of Parliament.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I acknowledge the mildness of the language in which the right hon. Gentleman has made his demand upon the Government, and if I am unable to accede to the demand I trust I shall have no occasion to say anything which will make a refusal more disagreeable than it must be from its own nature. The case stands thus—During the discussions on this Bill this is not the first occasion upon which we have had to encounter great difficulties and to give serious offence. When these occasions have arisen we have never been troubled and hindered in our course by any of those more selfish considerations relating to the dignity of the Government which it may be sometimes, unfortunately, necessary to take into view. We have found it unnecessary to fall back upon any considerations of that kind, and we have simply asked what was our duty with regard to the great public interests involved. Upon each of these occasions what we have endeavoured to do has been this—We have striven to reduce to a minimum the cause which was in dispute between ourselves and those who differ from us. That is the manner in which we endeavoured to meet the debates on the second reading and the Amendments subsequently introduced into the Bill. It is not in our power now, or on former occasions, altogether to remove those causes of difference. We have had to encounter from many valued Friends objections to the course we felt it our duty to adopt similar to those now made by opponents, who, as I fully own, by their conduct on this question have merited every consideration at our hands. But the position we now occupy is precisely that in which we have stood before, only with reference to different persons. We have shown our disposition to meet the views of hon. Members opposite, by reducing to the character of a provisional and temporary regulation the adoption of the principle which we propose to introduce into the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman says we have encumbered the measure with a great political difficulty. I venture to question the justice of that criticism; because the principle of secret voting, with reference to local elections for particular purposes, is a principle which already has its place upon the statute book, and formed no political difficulty when thus enacted. I admit that you may now raise further debates upon the precise terms in which it is proposed to frame this portion of the Bill; but I think I am fully justified in saying that, so far as regards the simple recognition of the principle of secret voting for elections of a local character, it is not true that we have encumbered the Bill with a political difficulty, at least with one which can be reckoned a political innovation. If, then, we are unable to accede to the demand of the right hon. Gentleman, we have not been in the least unwilling that there should have been a full discussion of the question. We shall make no complaint if the discussion is renewed hereafter; but we can only now take the course we have taken during the progress of the Bill—reduce the range of controversy within the narrowest limits, and abide in the last resort by what our public duty seems to demand.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 114; Noes 210: Majority 96.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the word "ballot," in order to insert the words "the method now in force for the election of guardians of the poor."—(Lord John Manners.)

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought this was substantially the question on which they had already divided when they divided on the Motion with reference to voting papers. He merely wished to recall the fact to the attention of the noble Lord, who could not wish to divide the Committee twice on the same question.

Question put, "That the word 'ballot' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 127: Majority 69.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON made an appeal to the Prime Minister, as a steady supporter of his Bill, to support the Amendment he was about to move—that after the word "Ballot" these words should be added—"But the votes given shall be open to the inspection of any ratepayer." As the word secret was given up, there could be no objection to his Amendment.

Mr. Disraeli

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word "ballot" to add the words "but the votes given shall be open to the inspection of any ratepayer."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH observed, that the Act of Will. IV., to which the Prime Minister referred, imposed no obligation on the inspectors of the voting papers to make any secret of them after they were delivered.

SIR HENRY HOARE appealed to the Opposition to accept the proposal in favour of the Ballot as un fait accompli, and to allow the Bill to go to "another place," where they might hope that it would be deprived of the objectionable feature they so much disliked.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that it was now proposed to convert the word "Ballot" into a mockery. With regard to what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Sclater-Booth) he had to say that by the Act of 1831 the inspectors were forbidden to open the voting papers when delivered, which was the only time when they could be identified with the voter.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked, whether the Vice President could name any parish where the Act of Will. IV. had been put in operation?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that they were placing in the hands of the Education Department, by the provision under which a scrutiny was to be made, the extraordinary power to cancel any election.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was not aware of any parish where the Act of Will. IV. had been put in operation; but a subsequent compulsory Act of the 18 & 19 Vict. applied to the whole of the metropolis, and it was probably in the metropolis alone that this election would occur. There was no power given to the inspectors to identify the vote with the voter after the vote was given. It was said that extraordinary powers were now asked for; but the Government only took powers for one year, and not for the purpose of prejudging the Ballot question, but because they were obliged not to let the wheels of the system stop during that year.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped, if this Amendment was not carried, another would be moved to make the Ballot permissive.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 187: Majority 89.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Arthur Guest.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 178: Majority 88.

MR. VANCE said, he had not until this evening given a vote, because he thought the Bill contained principles which ought not to be extended to Ireland next year. He could, however, no longer restrain himself. He had heard that there was a good deal more business on the Paper, and as he understood that the Dublin City Voters Disfranchisement Bill was to be brought on about 3 o'clock, he thought it would be better that the House should now adjourn. He moved, in conclusion, that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Vance.)

MR. R. N. FOWLER regretted the decision to which Her Majesty's Government had come to mix up the Ballot with the question of education. Still, hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House had fully expressed their opinion on the subject, and he hoped the Bill would now be allowed to proceed. If the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance) pressed his Motion to a Division he should be compelled to vote against it.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he hoped the Government would abandon their intention of incorporating the principle of vote by Ballot in the Bill.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he thought the Government might compromise the matter by confining the Ballot to the metropolis.

MR. COLLINS said, he was opposed to treating the metropolis in an exceptional manner.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 171: Majority 89.

MR. HIBBERT suggested that the Ballot should be taken in accordance with the provisions of 18 & 19 Vict.

[Committee—New Schedule.]

c. 120, the Metropolitan Government Act.

MR. CAWLEY moved to amend the proposed Amendment by inserting the words "in any district in which the ratepayers shall so determine."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to add, after the word "ballot," the words "in any district in which the ratepayers shall so determine."
—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had already stated that the intention of Government was to introduce the principle of secret voting into the election of local Boards, and he could not accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley). This was the first time since the accession of the present Government to Office that the majority of the House had had to maintain a conflict with a minority. He had before this given way after one Division; but there were cases in which the Public Business was of such importance as made it the duty of the majority to assert its just rights. He was not going to dictate to the House; but his opinion personally was that the present was a case in which the majority should persist, leaving the question of which side was right and which wrong to the intelligent judgment of the country.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was of opinion that the country, when it read to-morrow what had occurred in the House this evening, would unanimously condemn the conduct of Government. If the Bill should be defeated, on the Government would rest the responsibility.

MR. COLLINS suggested that the Ballot be taken according to the provisions of the Vestries Act.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was perfectly willing to give an unprejudiced consideration to the suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Hibbert), and would be prepared to discuss it on bringing up the Report to-morrow.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he thought the House ought to close with the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. His side of the House had made sufficient protest against the Ballot, and they ought now to look to the passing of the Bill.

Mr. Hibbert

MR. J. LOWTHER moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. James Lowther.)

SIR JOHN ESMONDE said, he thought it was not creditable to the House to keep the Prime Minister in such a position. He would suggest, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman should follow the example of the Leaders of the Opposition, and leave his supporters to fight the battle.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could not reconsider the principle of Ballot; but he would promise a careful consideration for any other proposal.

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA—DECLARATION OF WAR BY FRANCE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: Although under an Order of your Lordships' House I have no right to put to my noble Friend opposite the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, without giving Notice, any Question with regard to the complications now existing between France and Prussia, yet I think your Lordships will allow me to do so at a moment of such very great anxiety as the present. All the public journals of this evening contain an announcement which must fill your Lordships' minds with anxiety and with the deepest regret. It is no less than this—that France has declared war against Prussia. I shall not say another word, except to ask my noble Friend whether he has any official information of the fact, and whether it is true, or is only a rumour?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in answer to the Question put to me by my noble Friend, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government have received no official communication of the statement referred to by him as having been made in the French Chambers this afternoon; but I have no reason to doubt the truth of the commercial telegrams and Reuter's despatch which have been received, and it is with the deepest concern and grief that I give credence to the intelligence that war has been declared by France against Prussia. My Lords, I can only add—and I think your Lordships will not wish me to add more—that all the information which will enable you to form a judgment on the conduct of Her Majesty's Government shall be laid on the Table as soon as we can possibly deal with the no inconsiderable mass of Papers relating to the subject.

ADMIRALTY—NAVAL RETIREMENT.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving for Copies of Correspondence between Flag Officers and the Admiralty relating to the last scheme of retirement, said, their Lordships were, no doubt, aware that considerable discontent existed among flag officers with reference to the scheme of retirement which had recently been adopted by the Admiralty; but he had thought it right to wait until the immediate differences at the Admiralty were for the time settled before inviting their Lordships' attention to the subject. He made every allowance for the difficulty in devising any satisfactory scheme of naval retirement, for no officer liked to be put on the shelf, even with an increase of pay; but there were several points in connection with the present scheme to which he was anxious to call attention. The Order in Council of 1866, which—he being then First Lord of the Admiralty—was passed with the approval of many Members of the present Government, provided that any naval officer who had served on the Board of Admiralty should have his time at that Board counted as active service. This regulation was advantageous for the public service, considering the disinclination of many distinguished officers to join the Board, of which he had had personal experience, when it was necessary to fill two vacancies caused within ten days by death, and it was in consequence of this unwillingness that the Order held out to the profession this inducement to give the Admiralty their assistance. It being necessary in these days to have a civilian First Lord, professional assistance, whether in the form of a Board, a Council, or Assistant Secretaries—no matter what it might be called—was indispensable, and it was desirable to obtain men of standing and experience in whom the Navy had confidence for this purpose. The late Order in Council, however, set aside this regulation; and the effect would be that any naval officer joining the Board of Admiralty must either make up his mind to be shelved from active service, or must be constantly endeavouring to return to such service. The reason given for this change, that after 10 years' absence from sea an officer was not fit to command a fleet, he denied. Sir Alexander Milne had been 10 years ashore when he recommended him as a man of great sagacity and ability for the command of the North American and West Indian station at a time when American affairs were in a very delicate position; and Lord Lyons was also appointed to command a fleet after 10 years absence from sea. Under the present Order no such appointments could have been made; and it was surely unstatesmanlike and unwise to fetter the discretion of the Government, and thus to disqualify one who might be the best man in favour of a younger officer for service which, perhaps, required greater experience. He complained, moreover, of the way in which the Order was passed. The scheme of 1866 was laid on the Table of the House of Commons, and, after about a fortnight, was discussed and sanctioned; but the present Order came by surprise on Parliament and the Navy; and when it was criticized in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister—so report said—rose and said it could not be meddled with, as this would compromise the Prerogative. It was not to be wondered at that when more recently the Prime Minister again came forward with his high transcendental notions of Prerogative, the House of Commons decided against him, and left him in a minority. The practical effect of the Order would be to make naval officers indisposed to join the Admiralty, for fear of losing the chance of rising in their profession. He admitted that the Order of 1866 might have been wisely modified to the extent of providing that five years at the Admiralty should count as service at sea, but no longer period. The officer at the head of a dockyard was to have his time count, and à fortiori, a Lord of the Admiralty, whose functions were more important, should be allowed a like advantage. Among those affected by the Order were Sir Michael Seymour and Sir John Hay, the latter of whom had given his time and abilities to the Admiralty, and whom he himself, when First Lord, frequently employed, although politically opposed to him. The Order, again, debarred from the distinctions of Admiral of the Fleet and Vice Admiral and Rear Admiral of the United Kingdom officers not on the active list. These purely honorary positions, with no pay attached to them, surely ought to be given to men who had rendered the greatest services, whether at present on the active list or not. It was conceded that officers in command of a ship before 1815 should be allowed to remain on the active list; but one would have imagined that these officers must have reached an age when active service was not to be expected. It was unwise and unfair to hurt the feelings of distinguished officers by excluding them from these honorary distinctions. One or two points in the scheme would certainly have to be modified, for no Government could permanently cripple itself in the selection of officers. The number of lieutenants was to be cut down to 600; but in the last Russian War we had more than 600 in active employment; while in 1860 we had 693, in 1861, 712, and in 1862, 650 in active employment. We were now cutting down our lieutenants to the lowest possible amount. No doubt, in case of emergency, assistance might be called in from the Naval Reserve; but he thought we were cutting down the number of officers to such an extent as was hardly compatible with the efficiency of the service. He would leave the matter to the consideration of the Government, hoping they would take an early opportunity of modifying at least that part of the Order which had hurt the feelings of many distinguished officers.

Moved, "That there be laid before the House Copies of any Correspondence between Flag Officers and the Admiralty relative to the last scheme of retirement."—(The Duke of Somerset.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, there was no objection, on the part of the Admiralty, to the production of the Correspondence moved for. He should, however, ask their Lordships' indulgence whilst he offered a few words in explanation with reference to the Order which had been called in question by the noble Duke. He need hardly remind their Lordships that any great change in the great establishments of the State necessarily affected some interests and called forth a number of dissentients, nor did he deny that a considerable number of letters had been received by the Admiralty complaining of the practical result of the Order in individual cases. He admitted that the Admiralty should be prepared to show that a great change such as this in the Navy was necessary in the interests of the public service, and, at the same time, that it had been effected with as little injustice or injury to the officers affected by it as possible. Now, the facts were simply these—On the 1st January last, of 780 lieutenants, 261 were unemployed; of 401 commanders, 246 were unemployed; of 292 captains, 201 were unemployed; and of 95 flag officers, 81 were unemployed. Their Lordships would therefore see that the Order was not made before it was required. Ever since 1815 our Navy lists had been overcrowded, and it had been found necessary, by a series of shifts and contrivances, to stave off the evil of that system. When, in 1860, the principle of retirement by age was first proposed and vigorously carried out by the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) himself, it was not extended to flag officers; the principle of non-service, namely—that after a certain time officers should be retired from the active list—being applied to commanders and lieutenants, but not to the higher ranks of officers. In 1864 there was a less important change, consisting in a not very large reduction in the number of officers on the active list. The Order of 1866 for the first time ruled that an admiral might be retired; but it made an exception which had been repealed by the late Order. He would now pass to the Order in Council particularly referred to by the noble Duke. The first principle which commended that Order to the approval of their Lordships was that no officer should suffer pecuniary loss by its operation. Any officer who did not wish to accept the pecuniary terms under the new Order could remain under the old Order, and would still have all the same chances of promotion and higher pay which were open to him under the previous Order. The next principle which formed the basis of the new Order was that of sea service. The great object of the Board of Admiralty was to make such arrangements by reducing the active list as would keep a sufficient staff of officers continually at sea, or find them employment whenever they applied for it. Under this Order, moreover, those officers who had borne the burden and heat of the day were in the evening of their lives sure of receiving a much higher sum as retired pay than those who had not served so long a period of their lives on active duty. In respect to what might be called non-service, the Order provided that when a lieutenant or commander had been five years from sea, a captain seven years from sea, or when 10 years had elapsed since an admiral had hauled down his flag, he must join the retired list. The number of admirals on the active list was reduced from 85 to 50. Admirals who served at the Admiralty would count their time there for 10 years exactly in the same way as any other officer; but the time would not count as sea service for the purpose of preventing a flag officer from being placed on the retired list. The most important regulation was that an officer unemployed for 10 years should haul down his flag. Now, considering the continual reconstruction of the fleet; considering also that iron-clads were becoming more and more the fashion, and employment getting less; that, should war break out, the fighting would be done in a very few weeks, instead of an admiral being expected to sail over the sea for several months before anything decisive occurred, was it unwise that an admiral or captain unemployed for 10 years should not be allowed to have a command? Fifty admirals were a complement ample, but not too large; and it was intended that they should be young and active, and thoroughly fit to command a fleet, while so small amount of service as had of late years been required of flag officers would not continue to be the case. The principle of sea service was supported by high authorities, including Sir John Pakington, who, when the Order of 1866 was published, commenting on the exceptional treatment of Admiralty service, asked why the rule of making an officer either serve or retire should not be uniformly applied. He (the Earl of Camperdown) saw no reason why the Order should prevent flag officers from coming to the Admiralty. It would rather encourage them to join it for five or six years, since there would be a probability of their then obtaining a command. It was desirable, too, that officers should pass more frequently between the Admiralty and the fleet, so as to keep up a communication between them. Could there be a better way of securing Lords of the Admiralty who possessed the confidence of the Navy than the selection of an officer who had lately been at sea, and after a few years would return to active employment? As to vested rights, it was argued that the position of the officers who, under the Order of 1866, accepted service at the Admiralty ought not to be interfered with; but no Order could be passed which did not more or less interfere with existing interests. Up to 1866 the position of an admiral was unassailable—and they might have urged, as in fact they did, that after previous Orders they ought to remain on the active list. Complaints were made then as now, and the flag officers then retired were retired on half their actual pay; whereas the present Order treated them more liberally.

The Earl of Camperdown

Sir Frederick Grey and Admiral Eden were members of the Board which framed the Order of 1866, which did not treat individual interests as vested ones, and there was no reason why the principle laid down in that Order should not now be further extended. He had a strong personal respect for each and every one of the officers referred to, and he hoped the explanation he was prepared to give of the principles which actuated the Board of Admiralty would enable their Lordships to judge whether those principles were right or wrong. He believed that, on the whole, the Order commanded the distinct approval of the Navy. As to the number of lieutenants, there was no fair analogy between the circumstances of the Crimean War and the present time. What sized vessels would be employed 10 years hence was uncertain; but nothing like the same number of lieutenants could be employed as at the time of that war. On the noble Duke's own showing not above 100 beyond the present complement would in any event be required. If, however, it were found that 600 lieutenants were too small for the efficiency of the Navy in a time of great emergency it would be easy to increase the number; and this was better than keeping in enforced idleness a number of young officers, to whom we looked for our future captains, commanders, and admirals. The Rear Admiral and Vice Admiral of the United Kingdom clearly ought to be officers on the active list, and they were so treated, and the creation of additional good-service pensions tenable by officers in retirement would prevent any injury to officers now or hereafter on the retired list. If after the Correspondence had been laid on the Table any noble Lord called attention to the matter, it would be his duty to explain the principles on which the Admiralty had acted, and it would be for their Lordships to judge how far they were right.

EARL GREY: I do not differ from my noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) as to its having been necessary to make a considerable change in the regulations for promotion and retirement in the Navy; on the contrary, I believe that it would have been expedient to make even a larger change than has been attempted by the Board of Admiralty, and, instead of merely patching up the existing system of appointing and promoting naval officers, to look more deeply into its inherent defects, with the view of effecting a much more complete reform, and adapting the rules of the service to the wants of the present time. Nor do I join in those complaints which my noble Friend expects to be made as to the bearing of the new regulations on the pecuniary interests of officers—they have other grounds of complaint—but I am prepared to admit that, so far as their pecuniary interests are concerned, the arrangement, on the whole, is not an unfair one. But I chiefly find fault with the measure not on account of the way in which it affects individuals, but because it seems to me injudicious as regards the public, and because the manner in which it was adopted is objectionable. Knowing, as I do, that the House is naturally anxious to proceed to other and important business, omitting all reference to other parts of the recent Order in Council, I will only offer to your Lordships some remarks on the effect of the rules now laid down with regard to the advancement and retirement of flag officers. In the advancement of officers to flag rank, there are two objects in view—first, to create a class of officers eligible for high employment, and, secondly, to confer on officers the reward they have fairly earned by their past services. I think the error into which the Admiralty has fallen has been that of not bearing in mind that in framing the regulations of the service these two objects require to be separately considered. Some years ago I would remind your Lordships that the same difficulties which have led to the promulgation of the recent Order in Council with reference to the naval service, were still more strongly felt in the Army, and that at the beginning of the Crimean War a Commission, of which I had the honour of being a Member, was appointed to consider what changes ought to be made in the rules as to promotion in the Army for the purpose of enlarging the field of selection for officers for important commands. That Commission, which included both several distinguished military officers and gentlemen who had filled high offices in the civil administration of the Army, unanimously came to the conclusion, that unless the two objects I have mentioned—that namely, of providing a sufficiently large class of officers eligible for commands to afford a proper field for selection, and that of rewarding past services—were separately considered it would be impossible to do justice both to the public on the one hand, and to the officers of the Army on the other. The Commission, therefore, advised in their Report, that in order to extend the field for the selection of officers for command, all colonels who had fulfilled certain conditions of service should be eligible for employment as general officers, without reference to seniority; and that, at the same time, the rules which then existed, and by which officers rose regularly by seniority to the rank of generals, should continue substantially unaltered. This unanimous recommendation of the Commission was adopted by the Government, and the effect was, that while the just expectations of officers of reward for their past services were not interfered with, an ample field was opened for the selection of officers for actual commands from those who were still in the vigour of their age. The system thus adopted in the Army on the advice of the Commission has, in my opinion, on the whole worked well, though, in consequence of some faults of detail in the scheme itself, and of still greater faults in the manner in which it was applied by the authorities to whom the discretion of acting upon it was entrusted, the stream of promotion in the Army is still less rapid than would be desirable. But in the Navy not only in the present, but in previous Orders in Council, a different principle has been adopted. Flag officers have been divided into those on the active and on the retired list; those on the active list being considered alone eligible not only for employment, but also for rising to the highest honorary posts in the profession. Officers are also placed on the one or the other of these lists, not according to their actual fitness for employment, nor yet strictly according to their claims to reward for their past services, but according to arbitrary rules, in which these two considerations are confounded together. Being on the active list does not in the least show that an officer is really fit for employment; it only shows that he has fulfilled certain conditions of service, and that he has served within a certain time. The new rules would allow an admiral to remain on the active list though he had become bedridden, and, on the other hand, they would have prevented Lord Lyons from being employed in the Crimean War, in which he served with so much advantage to the country, because more than 10 years had elapsed since he was afloat. Surely an arrangement cannot be regarded as satisfactory which would have excluded from employment a man so eminently fit for it as Lord Lyons, and yet provides no security for preventing the list of those eligible for employment from being crowded with officers no longer fit for it. It is not less objectionable in its operation in determining what officers are to succeed to the highest honorary posts in the profession. The new Order in Council says that no officers shall rise to the posts of Admiral of the Fleet or Vice Admiral of the United Kingdom unless they are on the active list. But, I suppose because it was felt that this would inflict an injustice which would be quite intolerable on some officers, a proviso is added that officers who were in the actual command of ships before 1815 should remain on the active list. These officers cannot now be less than 80 years old. Is there any common sense, then, in retaining them on the active list? If being Admiral of the Fleet or Vice Admiral of the United Kingdom implied that the officers holding these posts were to go to sea, it would be simply absurd to provide for allowing them to be held by men of so advanced an age; but if—as is the fact—these are merely honorary appointments, look at the injustice which will be inflicted by confining them to officers on the active list, under the rules now laid down. Sir Michael Seymour, whose services have been so long and so distinguished, including employment in two Chinese wars, will be excluded because he happens to have passed the age at which he must be placed on the retired list before a vacancy arises, and another officer with, perhaps, less than half his claims may be appointed to it, merely because he has not then attained that age. Being on the active list ought either to be taken as indicating the officers eligible for employment—and, in that case, being retained upon it, should depend not upon the past services of an officer, but on his actual fitness, periodically tested—or else it ought to be regarded as a reward for past services, and in that case officers ought not to be excluded from it, and thus prevented from rising to the highest honorary posts in their profession on account of not having been employed for a certain time. My noble Friend the noble Duke has justly pointed out that the operation of the rules, as they stand, will be most injurious to the public service with reference to the Board of Admiralty. He has told your Lordships that already there is a disposition on the part of able and experienced officers whose services are needed at the Board to prefer serving afloat. Nothing then can be more unwise than to give to such officers a new motive for reluctance to serve at the Admiralty by refusing to allow their services at the Board to reckon as a qualification for the highest rewards of the profession. And I would point out to your Lordships that this is directly contrary to the policy pursued in the Army. I find that by the latest warrant regulating promotion in the Army, employment in various offices of which the duties are purely civil is allowed to reckon as well as more strictly military service in qualifying colonels to rise to be general officers. Thus, the Inspector of Clothing and the members of the Council of Military Education are allowed to reckon the time they have given to these duties as qualifying them for promotion, and most properly—you want to induce able men to accept the employment and therefore make it carry with it a due reward. The duties of naval officers on the Board of Admiralty are far more important and arduous than those of the officers I have mentioned, and ought not to be differently regarded. I cannot conclude without adding a few words on the manner in which this measure has been adopted. My noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) has told us that notwithstanding the objections that have been taken to this Order in Council it has been accepted with satisfaction by the great majority of naval officers. I do not know where my noble Friend has got this information, certainly all that I have been able to obtain has been of a very opposite character. I am told that the oldest officers in the service have said that there never was a time within their recollection in which there prevailed among their brother officers so general a feeling of dissatisfaction and of insecurity. This arose even less from the faults in the Order itself—great as they were — than from the manner in which it was adopted. My noble Friend the noble Duke has pointed out to you that before the Order in Council of 1866 was passed, the scheme of retirement to which it was to give effect was laid before the House of Commons, and, after full opportunity had been given of considering it in all its details, a vote in approval of it was obtained, and that it was not until this had been done, and till all who felt themselves aggrieved by it had thus been enabled to urge their objections to it, that it was formally submitted to Her Majesty in Council and passed. The Order of the present year, on the contrary, was actually passed before any authentic statement of its provisions was given to the public, so that no opportunity whatever was given of discussing them while this might still have been of use. My noble Friend has pointed out that this mode of proceeding is open to great objections; but there is one most important circumstance connected with it which he has not mentioned, and which renders it still more deserving of censure. Your Lordships are aware what is the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. You know that it is composed of a First Lord, who for many years has always been a civilian, and of Junior Lords, two or three of whom are naval officers. Technically, all the members of the Board have equal power, and every determination it comes to must be sanctioned by a majority of those present. It has, however, always been understood that the First Lord being a Cabinet Minister, and representing the Government, has a right to expect that the junior members of the Board, though entitled freely to express their opinion on every question that may arise, should, as a general rule, defer to his judgment. But while the supreme authority, and the responsibility which this authority carries with it, rests with the First Lord, the professional members of the Board are justly regarded as having a certain responsibility for its measures. It is their duty to take care that no measures injuriously affecting their brother officers or the general interests of the profession shall be hastily adopted, and while, in all ordinary cases after having stated their own opinions, they properly defer to that of their Chief, on questions of the highest importance, they ought rather to resign, than become parties to decisions to which they entertain strong and insurmountable objections. It would not be difficult to mention cases in which this view of the position of the Junior Lords of the Admiralty has been acted upon—a remarkable one occurs to my mind of a distinguished admiral who left the Board, because he could not carry an increase in the crews assigned to the several classes of ships of war which he believed to be indispensable. In this respect the position of the Junior Lords of the Admiralty does not differ from that of the subordinate members of all other Departments of the Government. An Under Secretary of State, for instance, does not hesitate in all ordinary cases to carry into effect the orders of his superior, though they may not be in accordance with his own opinion; but it is his duty to resign when the Government adopts any measure of very high importance in which he feels he cannot honestly concur. This was once my own case when I felt myself compelled to resign the Office of Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, though my own father was at the head of the Government, because it decided not to adopt so large a measure as I believed to be necessary for the abolition of colonial slavery. In all the Departments of the State a necessary and a proper check is thus imposed on the Ministers at their head, without interfering with their legitimate authority; but with regard to this Order in Council on naval promotions and retirement this check has been virtually set aside, unless the statements made in the other House of Parliament and in the newspapers are erroneous. It appears from these statements that the new scheme of retirement was never brought before the Board of Admiralty at all; that it was not till after it had been formally sanctioned by Her Majesty that one, at least, of the naval Lords was aware of its provisions, and that a strong disapproval of some of these provisions has since been expressed by more than one of them. The passing of an Order in Council so deeply affecting the interests of the Navy in a manner which has deprived the Naval Lords of the Admiralty of their legitimate opportunity of bringing forward their objections to it, has necessarily created in the minds of their brother officers who look to them for protection from measures unfairly affecting them, a strong feeling of dissatisfaction and of insecurity for the future.

IRISH LAND BILL.

COMMONS' AMENDMENTS CONSIDERED.

Commons' Amendments to Lords' Amendments and Commons' Reasons for disagreeing to some of the Amendments made by the Lords, considered (according to Order).

The said Amendments and Reasons read by the Clerk.

EARL GRANVILLE hoped that he might be allowed to say a few words as to what had passed in the Commons. He thought the course taken by the other House had, in a great measure, justified that taken by their Lordships; because, since a large number of the Amendments made by their Lordships had been agreed to by the Commons, the natural inference was, that their Lordships had made improvements in the Bill. What the Commons objected to agree to were chiefly clauses that had excited great difference of opinion in their Lordships' House — matters, perhaps, of no very great importance, but which savoured too much of giving a slight advantage to the landlord at the expense of the tenant. The first Motion which he had to make was, that their Lordships should not insist upon an Amendment made at the instance of the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) in the scale of compensation, by which £4 was inserted in lieu of £10, and £20 in lieu of £30. Such Amendment, if insisted on, would have the effect of refusing compensation to a large class of tenants in Ireland.

Moved, Not to insist on the Amendments in page 2, lines 31, 32, 33 and 35, to which the Commons have disagreed.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that although he should have preferred the scale as altered by their Lordships, he did not think it of sufficient importance to ask their Lordships to insist upon the alteration which they had made. The scale of compensation was more a matter of detail than of principle, and there must be much difference of opinion as to what particular figure should entitle a tenant to compensation. He thought this might be a convenient opportunity for stating what course he should take with reference to the Amendments generally. With regard to the alteration that had been made by their Lordships by substituting 21 years for 31 years as the length of lease that should bar the claim to compensation, that, again, he considered not so much a matter of principle as of opinion; and though he still thought that 21 years was quite sufficient time to enable a tenant to recoup himself, yet he did not think that the matter was of sufficient importance to ask their Lordships to insist upon their Amendment. That, however, was the limit of the concessions that he was able to make. He found that an Amendment had been introduced in the House of Commons, after the Bill had left that House, limiting the right of the landlord to deduct from the compensation paid any arrears of rent not exceeding three years. To this he decidedly objected. He thought it perfectly fair that where a landlord was called upon to make compensation to the tenant, all sums of money that were properly due to him from the tenant should be taken into consideration; but the Amendment made by the House of Commons would prevent this. The landlord might have to pay the tenant compensation amounting to four years' rent, and yet he could not recoup himself to the extent of more than three years' rent, although more were due. Now, this was quite unjust, and therefore he would advise their Lordships not to assent to it. The next point regarded con-acre; as to that there had been an agreement between both sides of the House as to the words to be adopted; and nothing could be more straightforward than the conduct of the Government upon this point. They said that they would not alter the words unless there was a strong opinion to the contrary expressed in the other House. The House of Commons took what he considered a most extraordinary course, and entirely altered what had been previously agreed on, and in so doing had, he thought, made nonsense of the matter. At the same time, he would assent to some of the alterations which had been made in reference to con-acre. As to permissive registration of improvements, he must ask their Lordships to restore the clause to the terms in which it had been agreed to by their Lordships. The only other Amendment of importance which he should ask their Lordships to disagree with was, that by which it was provided that non-payment of rent should not be deemed a disturbance if the Court should decide, on special grounds, that it ought not to be so considered. He must ask their Lordships to insist on the present Amendment.

Commons' Amendment to insert in page 3, line 13, after ("rent") the words ("not exceeding three years' rent") disagreed to.

Commons' Amendment, relating to the provision respecting conacre amended, and agreed to.

Then it was moved not to insist on the Amendment in page 4, line 1, to which the Commons have disagreed—namely, to leave out ("twenty-one") and insert ("thirty-one").

On Question, Whether to insist? Resolved in the Negative.

Commons' Amendments in clause relating to presumption of improvements agreed to.

Clause "A," (Permissive registration of improvements).

EARL GRANVILLE recommended that their Lordships agree to the Commons' Amendments in the clause. As the clause now stood, any landlord and tenant who might be desirous of preserving evidence of any improvements made by themselves or either of them, or by their or either of their predecessors in title, before or after the passing of this Bill, might jointly at any time file a schedule in the Landed Estates Court, specifying such improvements and claiming the same accordingly, and such schedule so filed should be evidence that such improvements were made as therein described. He thought the latter part of the clause could have no effect but to promote litigation.

LORD CAIRNS hoped that whatever shape the clause might take, it would not become law in its present form. The case supposed by the clause was one in which the landlord and tenant were agreed as to who made the improvements—and one might have supposed that that was all that was necessary; yet it provided that they should jointly proceed to Dublin and incur the expenses of employing professional advisers to prepare a schedule. The matter did not end there, because the schedule was to be filed in the Landed Estates Court. The clause stated that the document so filed should be evidence of the contract. It would not be evidence; but it would be the contract itself. He regretted that there was not known to the law of England and Ireland what was known to the law of Scotland—namely, a "declarator"—by means of which questions of fact were so settled that there could be no dispute about them at a future time. This clause, as altered by the House of Commons, would not do that. It provided for registration only in cases where the landlord and tenant jointly wished for it, and agreed in the contract which was to be registered. The landlord who made improvements could not by himself register them, so that the question of fact would be settled for all time. How many lawsuits they would prevent in future by having some record made of improvements while there was some person alive to speak to the facts! The danger was in allowing things to drift along in uncertainty till a future time without having some record now which would avert future litigation.

LORD O'HAGAN said, he did not like the clause at all. He thought the original position taken by the Government in that House was the true one—namely, to resist that clause altogether. When it was first introduced it was prospective only, and in that form he should have had no objection to it. But it had been made retrospective, and in that form he had the strongest objection to it. There were thousands of tenancies in Ireland where improvements were at this moment going on; and if all at once, when that Bill came into operation, it was made a matter not of choice, but of necessity for every landlord and every tenant to register immediately and challenge his tenant or his landlord, as the case might be, in respect to the right to improvements, they would precipitate the result which it had been predicted would flow from that measure—but predicted, he trusted, erroneously—that it would be the fruitful parent of litigation; whereas it was most desirable that the measure should commence its operation in Ireland amid circumstances of mutual kindness and good-will between landlord and tenant.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, they ought to discourage litigation not only at present, but in the immediate future. He knew the case of a landlord in the South of Ireland who had spent £50,000 in improving his property, and he had no evidence of the improvements except the memory of the people among whom they were made. Those persons were dying out, and in a few years the landlord might have no evidence whatever to prove that he had made the improvements, and he might be called upon to pay his tenant for having made them. But if that clause were passed, as their Lordships had agreed to it, he could go into Court and register his improvements at once. If their Lordships did not adhere to that clause they would practically compel the landlord, where there had been large improvements effected, to evict his tenants in order to have the question of the authorship of those improvements immediately tried.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) had been over severe as to the legal knowledge of the Commons as displayed in this clause. It should be remembered the other House was not wholly without professional assistance on either side when it considered that matter; and while he agreed with the Lord Chancellor for Ireland that it would have been better not to have the clause at all, still, if they were to have it, he saw the use of having it in the form in which the other House had sent it up to their Lordships. The Amendments of the Commons were very good indeed, because they invited no litigation, but allowed both parties to register together. If there was any advantage in the thing at all it was in letting the parties, when they were perfectly agreed, go into Court, and record that about which there was no dispute.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND asked why, if they were quite agreed, the parties should go into Court at all? The supposition was that the landlord and the tenant together drew up a paper respecting the improvements made partly by the one and partly by the other; and that paper would be kept in the landlord's office; and, being agreed to by both parties, they would not want to go into Court. The clause, as passed by their Lordships, would be useful in providing for a register of improvements, which would be evidence at any future time; but as the clause came up from the other House it was perfectly useless, and ought not, therefore, to form part of the Bill. He would move to disagree to the Amendment made by the Commons in Clause A.

EARL GRANVILLE, in page 8, line 8, recommended their Lordships not to insist on the Amendment for leaving out from "landlord" to "and" in Clause 8, relative to disturbance. His object was to try to restore that provision in the measure to the form in which it originally came up to their Lordships. Being all agreed that the tenant should be compensated for his past improvements, he hoped their Lordships would not insist on their Amendment, the effect of which would be that where the rent of a tenant had been so exorbitantly raised that he could not reasonably pay it, he would be debarred from those claims for past improvements which, in ordinary cases, he would be entitled to receive.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that if they restored the clause to the form in which it had come up from the Commons, it would lead to very bad results. One man would complain that the season was bad, and, therefore, he could not pay his rent. Another would plead that his cattle had died; another that his pecuniary circumstances had been reduced to a very low ebb, in consequence of illness among his family. These points would be raised all over Ireland, and would be taken before those 33 assistant barristers, who might all form different opinions as to what were or were not special grounds. They were told that this Bill was to bring peace to Ireland; but he could not conceive anything more likely to produce the contrary effect than what was now proposed. The clause as their Lordships had amended it on a former occasion was very much better. In a variety of instances, great injustice might ensue from retaining the words.

LORD O'HAGAN said, if the chairmen of quarter sessions were not capable of determining what "special grounds" of this kind were, they were scarcely capable of determining other very large points upon which they had an entire discretion. The question was, whether there was not something in the circumstances of Ireland to justify this proposal? It was intended to refer to two classes of cases merely — one in which the tenantry under some exceptional landlords had been kept in a state of coercion, owing to a system of long arrears, extending sometimes to 10 and 15 years; the other in which the rents, altogether exorbitant, had been imposed under circumstances of oppression. It had, therefore, been thought well to give the Court the power of softening the oppression under which these tenants laboured not in cases of penalty for non-performance of any particular contract, but of absolute forfeiture. Some such provision was the more necessary since their Lordships had introduced the Amendment with regard to subletting, subdivision, bankruptcy, and insolvency.

LORD CAIRNS said, his objection to the proposal of the Government was that it was at variance with the whole principle of the Bill from beginning to end. That principle was, that the right to compensation on the part of the tenant should be correlative with the performance of his contract, and that the tenant who had broken the contract and had been removed on that account should not be allowed to say that he had been capriciously disturbed. They had already provided that, as a general rule, eviction for non-payment of rent should not be a disturbance; but the House of Commons had introduced the qualification, unless the Court decided that it ought on special grounds to be so deemed. That was as much as to say that anyone of the 33 assistant barristers might, upon special grounds laid down by himself, decide that eviction for non-payment of rent was a disturbance. The assistant barrister might say—"Parliament has left it to me to determine what are special grounds. Well, this is a bad year, and I will decide that to be special grounds." But then it might be said there was the Court of Appeal. Suppose the case came before that Court, the Judge of Appeal might say—"Parliament has not given me any directions to guide me as to what are special grounds;" and thus one Judge might decide one way and another another. The noble and learned Lord (Lord O'Hagan) had said there were only two classes of cases which would form special grounds. Well, he had himself said from the beginning if these were the only cases, would Her Majesty's Government put them on the face of the clause? He offered that challenge to the Government. Would they put on the face of the clause that eviction for non-payment of rent should not be deemed a disturbance unless upon the ground that the Court thought the rent manifestly exorbitant? He did not say he should vote for the clause if they did; but perhaps their Lordships might be induced to do so. Anything more contrary to principle than the proposal of the Government he could not imagine. It amounted to this—that a tenant was to be allowed to drive away all competitors by promising to pay a particular rent, and then when he came to be evicted for non-payment he was not to be obliged to give up the holding unless the landlord paid him a certain number of years' compensation. Another objection was the uncertainty this proposal would create. The only sound principle was to let the landlord and tenant know before they came into Court what they had to expect. If it were to be a matter of doubt whether the Court would or would not hold that there was a disturbance in any particular case, a landlord who came to an issue with his tenant would not know on what principle the compensation was to be assessed, and the consequence might be that a small landlord would be ruined. He trusted their Lordships would adhere to their Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY considered that it would be an enormous breach of faith if this country interfered with those who had purchased property under the Encumbered Estates Act. They had bought in the cheapest market, and they were selling in the dearest by getting the highest possible rents for the farms they had at their disposal. If their Lordships now thought the landlords had too much for their investment, and proposed to take off 10 or 20 per cent, they would be doing that for which they blamed Spain or Mexico, and people would not be induced to buy such property in future.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not understand why a man who purchased a quarter of a century ago was to be in a better position than one who had been in possession of an estate for 300 years, and had up to this time a legal right to all improvements, whether made by himself or his tenants. Words of strong indignation were inconsistent with what had been said on both sides of the House about the justice of giving compensation for improvements.

LORD CAIRNS admitted that moral justice required that when a tenant had made improvements he ought not to be deprived of them; but there was no moral justice in enabling a tenant to break his contract.

Question put, Whether to insist on the said Amendment? Resolved in the Affirmative.

Then it was moved to insist on the Proviso to Clause 8, to which the Commons have disagreed—namely,

“That in case of the determination of a tenancy by ejectment for non-payment of rent, the Court may treat such ejectment as disturbance if the arrears did not wholly accrue within the three previous years, and if any earlier arrear remained due from the tenant at the time of commencing the ejectment.”

Question put, Whether to insist on the said Proviso? Resolved in the Affirmative.

Committee appointed to prepare reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to some of the said amendments: The Committee to meet forthwith: Report from the Committee of the reasons; read, and agreed to; and a message sent to the Commons to return the said Bill, with amendments and reasons.

TRANSFER OF GAMBIA TO THE FRENCH.—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF MANCHESTER rose to put a Question to the Secretary of State for the Colonies respecting the proposal to transfer the Settlement of the Gambia to the French. The transaction to which his Question referred was a subject of serious importance, as it appeared to him to involve the undue exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown. He understood that it was intended to hand over a part of the British dominions to the Emperor of the French on this day month. He hoped this was not the case, for if the sad events which the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had said we must anticipate were about to occur, it seemed to him that we could not, without a breach of neutrality, hand over a seaport of great capacity, and advantageously situated for a coaling station, to a nation which was at war with one of our allies. The Gambia Settlement was no burden to us, and in the event of war it would be of very great importance. It had a river without a bar, was completely landlocked, and might be used as a coaling station. If the French thought it desirable to obtain it, it must be equally desirable for us to keep it. In addition to that, he thought we ought not to transfer the inhabitants of the territory to another Power without their consent. Again, in his opinion, the Government ought not to diminish the British territories without the sanction of Parliament; and he thought that our distant possessions ought also to be consulted on the question of transferring so important a coaling station as the Gambia. The inhabitants of the country were decidedly opposed to the contemplated transfer—indeed, he was informed that 600 of the coloured inhabitants had of their own motion, without instigation on the part of any Englishman, signed a Petition which had been sent to the Colonial Office, protesting against being handed over to France. The charge for the payment of English officials in the settlement was £10,000 a year, and a sum of £2,000 was paid for pensions. Its revenue more than covered its expenses, and it was estimated that there would be a surplus revenue this year of £7,000; and he believed the Colony already had some money invested in New Zealand Bonds, by direction of the Government. The inhabitants were strongly in favour of the territory being maintained as a British settlement, instead of being handed over to France; for it was of great importance as regards their trade that they should not be under the authority of the French, who had driven away English trade from every part of that coast which they occupied. It might, perhaps, be urged that our trade on the West Coast of Africa was not on the increase; but it certainly was not decreasing at this particular part of the coast. The Gambia was the best river on the Western Coast of Africa, and might be of very great use to us in the case of a naval war if we retained it in our hands, and he hoped the Government would not on any account give up so important a position to France or to any other country. He was the more anxious on this head because he feared the projected transfer might be the first step towards abandoning our Colonies. In conclusion, he asked the noble Earl to give the House some account of what had been done.

EARL GRANVILLE: I can readily answer the noble Duke as to the alleged undue exercise of the Royal Prerogative, because at the beginning of the negotiations with the French we distinctly stated to them that nothing could be completed without the consent of Parliament. As I was chiefly concerned in the matter, my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) has requested me to say that when the matter comes before Parliament for discussion you will find it excessively difficult to show what advantage is gained by this country by retaining possession of this settlement. No doubt, many years ago, when there was a profitable slave trade going on, we might have had an interest in it of a particular sort; and at a later period, when we were exerting ourselves to suppress the slave trade, we also had an interest in keeping the settlement; but as there is not a slave trade at present, and it is extremely improbable that it will ever again revive—and even if it should the French would be as anxious to repress it as we are—that reason entirely vanishes. The noble Duke says, however, that the place will be very advantageous in the event of war. I am sorry to say that this point was entirely left out of consideration by me while I was conducting the negotiations, for I cannot conceive what use Gambia could be in time of war, unless our seamen were seized with an unusual whim to run away and hide themselves from the rest of the world. With regard to the trade of the settlement also, I think the noble Duke has been most strangely misinformed. The trade has steadily fallen off, and the revenue with it. Last year there was a deficiency, and I cannot believe in the great surplus which the noble Duke has promised us this year. The trade of the French has been increasing steadily, while ours has been as steadily diminishing. The trade is of a kind which better suits the French than ourselves—chiefly consisting in palm oil and ivory—and there seems no reason why they should not prosecute it under their own management. The number of ships and their tonnage belonging to the Colony is ridiculously small for a great maritime country such as this. There are not more than 30 or 40 European subjects at the settlement, and there is no use in sending out official servants of the Crown to so deleterious a climate, and where they are exposed to all kinds of demoralization. The climate is such that the mortality produced by it among our representatives there has been greater than similar unfortunate occurrences in any other Colony; and while I was at the Colonial Office there was more trouble in settling the quarrels between different officials there than in transacting all the business of the Colony. Under these circumstances, I think the burden of proving that retaining the Colony will contribute in any degree to our prestige or trade rests with those who wish to keep it. It is very remarkable that our exports, which have been as high as £75,000, were last year only £25,000; while the exports from the African settlement, where there is no European Government at all, amount to £600,000. The noble Duke spoke of the wishes of the inhabitants, and remarked that they were all natives who had petitioned and showed a high class of education for such people. It is very remarkable, however, that they appear to have almost all written the same handwriting, and I am told that the getting up of the Petition was intrusted to a very respectable man who keeps a grog shop. I cannot, therefore, regard the Petition as entirely conclusive evidence upon any point. While the Colony would be of great advantage to the French in connection with their flourishing Colony of Senegal, I think it is no exaggeration to say that Gambia is to our country an absolute burden without any redeeming characteristics.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH hoped the Government would lay upon the Table of the House such Papers relating to the trade and revenue of the settlement and to the terms of the proposed cession as would give their Lordships full information upon the subject when they came to discuss it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, such Papers would be laid upon the Table.

House adjourned at half-past Eight o'clock, to Monday

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA.—QUESTION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I rise to put a Question to Her Majesty's Government not dissimilar to that which I addressed to them yesterday, though perhaps of a more specific character. I will not conclude with a Motion, because I am at all times desirous to maintain the established custom of business. I think, moreover, it will be quite possible for me to bring my inquiry within the legitimate limits of a Parliamentary Question, and I am sure that if from want of skill I unwillingly pass for a moment those limits, the House will place a liberal interpretation upon our regulations, considering the gravity of the subject which has induced me to put the Question. I am the less disposed to think I may not perform what I intend within the limits of a Question because I rise at this moment not to embarrass Her Majesty's Government, but, on the contrary, if it be not presumption in me to say so, to endeavour to assist and support them at a moment of extreme difficulty. The Question I am going to put to the right hon. Gentleman is this—Whether he can inform Parliament what, in his opinion, is the cause of the present disturbed state of Europe? It seems to me that the time has arrived when that Question is strictly legitimate. There have been two causes mentioned by public rumour for this unhappy state of affairs. One alleged cause has been that a German Prince has been a candidate for the vacant throne of Spain. I dismiss that subject altogether, as not an element of the Question I am addressing to the right hon. Gentleman, and I advert to it only to render that Question more perspicuous. I cannot induce myself to believe that in the 19th century, with its extended sympathies and its elevating tendencies, anything so degrading and so barbarous can occur as a War of Succession. I may also remark, in passing, that we have had an authoritative statement very recently from the Minister of France which at once disposes of the pretext that any pretensions of a German Prince to the Crown of Spain can be the cause of the present state of affairs. But, Sir, there is, in public rumour at least, another cause alleged, and it is with regard to that I wish to make an inquiry of Her Majesty's Government. It is said that between these two allies of Her Majesty, between whom this unhappy misconception seems suddenly to have arisen, there have been for a long time many causes of misunderstanding, much jealousy and distrust, and many difficulties as to their mutual relations, or their relations with other countries of Europe, which have been left open and unsettled, and that suddenly there has been a resolution in some quarters to bring about a precipitate settlement of those questions. Now, Sir, what I would venture to observe is this—If there be any truth in this statement, any foundation for the circumstances I allege, the cause of controversy between those allies of Her Majesty is purely a diplomatic cause. It has not arisen from an invasion of each other's territory or from any outrage which has been committed against the national honour of either throne; but it is purely a diplomatic question, and the causes must have existed for some time. What I wish to bring before the consideration of the Government and of the House of Commons as the foundation of the Question which I am going to prefer is this—that both these powerful States between whom this misunderstanding has arisen have, and have within a very short time, within only a few years, solicited the advice and prayed for the influence of Her Majesty to be exercised on their behalf. They have done more than that; they have induced Her Majesty to enter into engagements, and even perilous engagements, with a view of furthering their interests, securing the peace of Europe, and giving them the opportunity, the happy opportunity, of terminating all the questions of dissidence between them. Sir, under these circumstances I must express my opinion that, whatever may be the political competence of France or Prussia to declare and carry on war—and no one can question that—I say that, under these circumstances which I have recalled to the memory of Parliament, neither France nor Prussia has a moral right to enter into any war without fully and really consulting Great Britain, to whose Sovereign a few years ago they appealed to exercise her influence, and even to enter into engagements, in order to preserve the peace between them. What I want to know from Her Majesty's Government is whether, in the representations they have made to the Courts of the Tuileries and of Berlin, this view of the case by England has been fairly put before them? I make no doubt that the usual representations which at so critical a time would be made by the authority of England have been preferred; but we have arrived at a moment when it is not sufficient to dilate upon the horrors of war and the blessings of peace, when it is not sufficient to dwell upon the abstract principles which ought to induce any State that meditates disturbing the general peace to appeal to the comity of nations. That, to my mind, is not sufficient now. I do not for a moment wish the House to suppose from the tone in which I express myself that I doubt that Her Majesty's Government have fulfilled the task I describe; but its public announcement would, I think, have a beneficial effect upon Europe at the present moment. I say it is the duty of the Government—which I trust and believe they have performed—to bring before the consideration both of France and of Prussia the peculiar claims which Great Britain has at this moment upon their confidence, upon their trust, and for a reasonable deference to her counsels. I wish, therefore, to know from Her Majesty's Government, whether they have urged this view of the case on the Courts of France and Prussia—whether they have reminded them of the great sacrifices and of the great exertions which at their request and instigation only a short time ago the Queen of England made in order to advance their interests, secure the peace of Europe, and give them an honourable opportunity of terminating their differences? That is the Question, an answer to which I shall be glad to receive from Her Majesty's Government. I will only venture, before I sit down, to express my individual opinion that the ruler of any country who at this time disturbs the peace of Europe incurs the gravest political and moral responsibility that can ever fall to the lot of man. I hear, Sir, superficial remarks made about military surprises, the capture of capitals, and the brilliancy and celerity with which certain results may be brought about. Sir, these are events of a by-gone age. In the last century such melodramatic catastrophes were frequent and effective—we live in an age animated by a very different spirit. The fate of a great country like France or Prussia cannot be ultimately affected by such incidents; and the Sovereign who trusts to them will find at the moment of action that he has to encounter, wherever he may be placed, a more powerful force than any military array, and that is the outraged opinion of an enlightened world.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is not for me to follow the right hon. Gentleman over the whole of his remarks, for he, I am sure, will agree with me when I say that at this particular moment he, in common with all other Members of this House, enjoys a freedom which does not belong to the Advisers of the Crown. At the same time, adverting to the impressive words with which he closed his speech, I must say that it is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, as it appears to be his opinion, that there is nothing in the circumstances, nothing in the differences which have lately appeared, which will justify, in the judgment and conscience of the world, a breach of the general peace. With respect to the Questions the right hon. Gentleman has put to me, they are, as I understand them, these two—He asks whether I can inform Parliament what, in the opinion of the Government, is the cause of the present disturbed state of Europe? I think, Sir, for the sake of those who have official responsibility, and of those who have the duties in relation to Foreign Powers which official responsibility entails, it would be better that I should avoid reference at the present moment to any causes which may have contributed to bring about the present menacing state of affairs other than those which have appeared. The right hon. Gentleman has also asked me whether Her Majesty's Government have made it part of their care to bring before the two great States, now engaged in communications that appear to be very proximate to hostilities, the peculiar claims of Great Britain to be heard in regard to their disputes, and to have the recognition of her title to offer friendly advice with a view to friendly settlement. I am bound to say neither of these two States has, in the present instance, shown the slightest disposition to impatience at the representations of Great Britain, or the slightest indisposition to allow her to exercise whatever title to friendly intervention may belong to her, or has put upon us the necessity of resorting to arguments drawn from any special juncture in former affairs for the purpose of making good that right on our part. But, Sir, I may say that that title to friendly offices, on the part of any one State of the civilized world towards any other State, really has been placed upon a foundation in Public Law by a great European act of recent times, which does not admit of its being brought into dispute. I refer, of course, to that Protocol of the Conference at Paris in 1856, whereby it was recognized, in the most solemn manner, at an assemblage of the representatives of all the Great Powers of Europe, to be the duty of each of those Powers, at least as a general rule, in case, unhappily, of controversy arising with a neighbour, to submit that controversy to some friendly adjudication before having resort to the last, melancholy, and horrible extremity of arms. With respect, therefore, to the Questions of the right hon. Gentleman, these are the answers I shall give to them. With respect to the actual state of affairs, I have no decisive intelligence to communicate to the House; but I am sorry to say the course of the communications and transactions thus far between the two Great Powers concerned has not been, on the whole, favourable. The point, however, is now very near at hand at which things must take a decisive course in favour of either peace or war. Any functions which we can discharge, any offices we can render, are necessarily limited; but I have the hope that when the time comes, and probably it must very soon arrive, at which it will be our duty to explain in detail that which it is now no less our duty to withhold, the House may be of opinion that Her Majesty's Government have not fallen short of the obligations incumbent on the representatives of England, and likewise have not gone beyond them.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I merely wish to say, in a few words, that I believe it is impossible for any of us, however strongly we may feel on this subject, to exaggerate the difficulty, the delicacy, and the responsibility of the position of the Ministry. Possessing, as they do, the full confidence of the House, it is impossible for us—["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) put a Question to the First Lord of the Treasury, which has been answered. If a Debate is to arise it cannot go on without a Motion.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I will not do that which I might do; but I will only express my regret that, as the subject has been so largely gone into by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire and by the First Minister of the Crown, it has not been introduced in such a way as to enable others to speak on the subject.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT said, he rose to express a deep sense of obligation—["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to point out to the hon. Member that, after what has just passed, and after the withdrawal of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman), it would be impossible, without unfairness to that right hon. Gentleman, to allow a debate to arise.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT: I will conclude with a Motion.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I must appeal to the hon. Gentleman not to persist in speaking, seeing the injustice it would be to the right hon. Gentleman who consented to withdraw.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT said, that as the feeling of the House against the course he proposed to take was evidently very strong, he would not persist in it; but he had thought his right hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman) would probably second his Motion.

MR. WHITWELL said, he rose to ask a Question of, or make a suggestion to, the Secretary to the Treasury. If hon. Members were—say, at Liverpool—every two hours they would receive telegrams from all parts of Europe; but attending the House of Commons, and rendering what service they could to the country, they were cut off from this intelligence. Would it not be possible to have arrangements made by which they might see telegrams every two hours, as they would if they were in the country?

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ASSESSED DUTY ON MALE SERVANTS
—ERRAND BOYS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BOURKE said, he rose to call attention to the hardship which would result to small tradesmen, errand-boys, and apprentices in consequence of the construction placed upon the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, by the authorities of Inland Revenue, who required the payment of the assessed duty of 15s. for a male servant if any domestic work were done by an errand-boy, &c. The subject appeared to be a very small one; but, from the number of communications he had received, it was one which affected a great number of the industrious subjects of Her Majesty, and about which there was very widespread dissatisfaction. The question arose upon the interpretation of the two words "male servant" in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act. Hitherto it had not been the habit to include in that category for the purposes of taxation errand-boys who were employed by tradesmen to carry messages in the conduct of their business, and who were incidentally employed also in performing trifling menial offices of a domestic character in the houses of small tradesmen. But this immunity from taxation was no longer to continue, and in the borough he represented (King's Lynn) a notice to that effect had been sent round. It was quite possible that this interpretation put upon the words by the Inland Revenue was correct; but surely this was a case in which the departmental authorities might be told that the words "male servant" were to be construed liberally; that it was not intended by Parliament that any little wretched errand-boy earning about two or three shillings a week should be taxed in the same way as a butler or groom of the chambers in a palatial establishment. He very much feared that this tax would fall upon the poor boys, and a deduction would be made from their wages equivalent to the tax. That would be a result which the House would not desire. But, even if that was not so, the tax would operate as a discouragement to persons to employ these boys, which was very often done from charitable motives as well as from motives of convenience. A tradesman, particularly in small towns, would take a boy into his house and keep and teach him; much good was thus done to the boy, and he was in this way started in life, and so rescued in many instances from the perils of the streets and from bad company. The practice was one which, on public grounds, ought to be encouraged, and which he thought ought to be regarded as a social and public advantage.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, it was admitted that the boys referred to were not previously subject to taxation; and, if this were so, some explanation was required of the tax being imposed now, because it was most distinctly stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and clearly understood by the House, that whatever alterations were made in the assessed taxes last year, no new taxes were to be imposed, and no new interpretations of the law were to be introduced. It would be far better to waive any extreme rights which the Revenue Department might have to these duties, and to re-enact the law with such modifications as might seem desirable, than to create a sense of injustice among those who were called on to pay the duties.

MR. C. S. READ said, that this was not the only instance in which some new interpretation had been put upon the law by the Excise Office. Tradesmen who placed on their circulars the arms of the city where they resided were charged for the duty on armorial bearings; and he had heard of the case of a farmer who lent a dozen of his horses to bring a lifeboat ashore, and who received two guineas from the society as a gratuity for the service, being surcharged for the whole of the horses on the ground that they were not exclusively used for agricultural purposes.

MR. STANSFELD said, he could not undertake to say that the Government would not place any interpretation on the statute of last Session which they might be advised was proper and legal, simply on the ground that different interpretations might have been put on it in various localities. All he could say was that they would be perfectly ready to consider each case of doubtful construction which might arise, and they would not desire to put a pettifogging interpretation on the Act. An errand-boy was not a servant, though he became one if he performed domestic duties; but in case those duties were of a trifling and irregular description, the Department might not feel bound to impose the tax.

SETTLEMENT OF GAMBIA.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he rose to call attention to the supposed preparations for transferring the Colony of the Gambia to France. He thought that the Government would pause before agreeing to any such cession when they learnt that 20,000 inhabitants of that Colony, being subjects of the Crown, were exceedingly averse to being transferred to the dominion of France. From what fell from the Under Secretary for the Colonies the other day it might be supposed that the number of the colonists in Gambia was not sufficient to give any importance to the proceeding in question, and he, therefore, wished to state that, although no very large tract of country in Gambia was in British possession, yet what this country held there was an extremely valuable possession. The Gambia was a fine river on the West Coast of Africa, navigable for 400 miles, and accessible for 200 miles of its course to vessels of the largest tonnage. It had been in English possession since 1664, with the exception of a short interval, when, after being captured, it was held by the French from 1702 to 1709. The River Gambia was within 10 days' steam of England, and though for four months the climate was unhealthy for Europeans, the white man could live there for the remaining eight months of the year as comfortably as on any spot within the tropics. He had been informed by some gentlemen belonging to the Colony, and who were now in this country, that the number of whites in the Colony was 160, though the Under Secretary for the Colonies had stated that the number was confined to 39 males and eight females. The number of half-castes was 1,500, of liberated Africans 3,000, of blacks 15,000—making the total population about 20,000, of whom above half were Christian. The education of these people, 1,100 being children, was conducted by the persons connected with two Churches, one belonging to the Church of England, and the other to the Roman Catholic Church, and by 16 missions of the Wesleyan Church sent from this country. There consequently existed not only a love to England on the part of that population, but also a religious antipathy to being handed over to France. He would quote from A Statement of Facts, presented to the Colonial Office, and signed by Mr. Thomas Brown, Member of the Legislative Council of Gambia, a description of what had recently occurred there—

“In April last, a rumour, originating in Senegal, was spread that the British Settlements on the Gambia were to be transferred to the French Government; but as this could not be traced to any authentic source the merchants did not credit it; but the Native traders and inhabitants were alarmed, and immediately addressed a Petition to Lord Granville, pointing out and protesting against the injustice of the measure. No reply to this Petition had been received in Gambia up to the 11th of June, nor had Major Bravo, the Administrator of the Colony, received from the Colonial Office any information upon the subject, so that the inhabitants are kept in complete ignorance on the subject. On the 1st of May the French gunboat Etoile arrived at Bathurst, Gambia, having on board a French engineer officer and the ‘Director of the Interior’ of Senegal, with letters from their Governor, requesting the Administrator of the Gambia to allow these officers to survey and examine the public buildings, which was granted. On the 5th of June the French Admiral (Burgois), with Colonel Valiere, the Governor of Senegal, arrived in Gambia on board the frigate Bellone, having the gunboat Etoile in company. Major A. Bravo, the Administrator of the Gambia, immediately called meetings of the merchants, as also of the Native traders and inhabitants of Bathurst, to introduce them to the Governor of Senegal, in order to learn his views on the intended transfer. Colonel Valiere stated that his visit was not an official one, as the transfer of the Gambia to the French had not been completed; but he could assure them that taxation would be very considerably reduced, and ample protection to trade would be afforded, and he would be glad to hear their opinions on the subject. The merchants replied they had received no intimation of the transfer, nor had they any idea of the terms or conditions proposed; but they stated they preferred to remain under the British flag. The Native traders and inhabitants protested most strongly against being handed over to France.”

He would not read further extracts from this statement, but what he had read was sufficient to show that the inhabitants of the Colony, our fellow-subjects, had good reason for believing that their cession to the French Government was in contemplation. Three gentlemen of eminence in the Colony, Mr. Brown, Mr.

Quinn, and Mr. Chowne, who were now in this country, stated that they had been requested by Sir Arthur Kennedy to inform him whether any and what objections were entertained to the proposed measure. They stated that considerable objection was felt to the proposed cession; that, as subjects of the Queen, they wished to remain under the dominion of England, and had no desire to be transferred to France. These, however, Sir Arthur informed them, were, he feared, not sufficient reasons, and the probability was the cession would take place in August next. It should be considered that, now the troops were removed, the Colony did not cost to the mother country a farthing. It paid £10,000 a year in the shape of salaries to the Administrator, chief magistrate, collector of Customs, the colonial surgeon, chaplain, engineer, clerks, police, and gaols. It also paid certain pensions which were chargeable on the revenue. As British subjects the colonists felt that the mother country should continue to give them protection, at all events until they were prepared for self-government and could establish themselves as an independent State, like Liberia, and not hand them over against their will to France, to which, both on political and religious grounds, they had particular objection. The Under Secretary for the Colonies on the 10th of June stated, in answer to a Question put to him—

"Communications have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France, having for their object the determining the limit of English and French influence on the West Coast of Africa, and that the transfer of Gambia to France is one of the steps under consideration as part of that arrangement. It may be well to state that, in 1868, the European population in Gambia numbered 39 males and eight females."—[3 Hansard, cci. 1842.]

That was the only information on the subject before the House. But a further statement had been made by the First Minister of the Crown, who, after quoting a legal opinion as to the power of Government to transfer a Colony, said—

"That there never had been the slightest intention of taking any proceedings of the kind without the consent of Parliament."—[Ibid. 1843.]

He had, therefore, thought it his duty to bring the matter before Parliament, because at that very time the right hon. Gentleman could not be aware that on the 5th of June the French Admiral had inspected the public buildings, and proceeded up the river, taking on himself to say that he was the representative of the Power to which very shortly the Gambia was to be transferred. The Under Secretary of State had, on a former occasion, alluded to the proceedings of a Committee in 1865, of which he (Sir John Hay) had the honour to be a member, and of which his right hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire (Sir Charles Adderley) was Chairman. Sir Charles Adderley had afterwards represented the Colonial Department in the House of Commons during the late Administration, and he, no doubt, had expressed views different from those which he (Sir John Hay) now was advocating. He must state, however, that the noble Duke at the head of the Colonial Department in Lord Derby's Ministry (the Duke of Buckingham) did not agree with Sir Charles Adderley on this particular point. The Report of the Committee did not justify the transfer of any Colony to any other Power. It only said that the settlement on the Gambia might be reduced by M'Carthy's Island, which is 150 miles up the river, being no longer occupied, and that the settlement should be confined as much as possible to the mouth of the river; that all further extension of territory or assumption of government, or new treaties offering any protection to Native tribes would be inexpedient; and that the object of our policy should be to encourage in the Natives the exercise of those qualities which may render it possible for us more and more to transfer to them the administration of all the Governments, with a view of our ultimate withdrawal from all, except, probably, from Sierra Leone. After the statement of the First Minister of the Crown in answer to his Question on the 10th of June, in which he pledged his Government to take no further step in regard to the transfer of Gambia to France, without consulting Parliament, a letter was written by order of Earl Granville, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, to the Chamber of Commerce, Manchester, on the 23rd of June, of which this was an extract—

"I am directed by Earl Granville . . . to acquaint you . . . that negotiations are going on with the French Government for exchange of territory on the West Coast of Africa, which will involve a cession of the Gambia," &c.

That extract seemed rather to be in opposition to the statement of the First Minister of the Crown, as it conveyed a strong impression that the Colonial Office had determined, without consulting Parliament, to carry out the arrangement. He (Sir John Hay) thought the question so important that he had felt it his duty to call attention to the subject, and he begged to move for the Papers of which he had given Notice.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would beg to second the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend, which he thought ought to give satisfaction to the Government, as it afforded them an opportunity of distinctly stating what their ideas were with regard to our colonial Empire; for there was an impression prevalent not in England only, but in the Colonies also, that the present Government were anxious to get rid of the Colonies. If that was not the feeling of the Government it ought to be distinctly stated. He was not in the House when a very interesting discussion took place on the subject of our Colonies, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens); but he read it with great interest, and it conveyed to him the impression that no great affection existed between the present Government and the Colonies, and now this supposed intention to transfer Gambia to France seemed to confirm that impression. In his mind, it was no matter whether a Colony was large or small, whether it was on the Coast of Africa or in the Pacific, the principle of ceding a Colony was a highly important matter. He thought the House would agree with him in this principle, that there were only two occasions when Colonies could honourably be ceded or exchanged. The one was after a war, when in the interests of peace it became necessary to recast the map of Europe, or of the world; and the other was when, as a military operation, it was not desirable to retain a Colony as an outpost. On a former occasion, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the cession of the Ionian Islands. But the Ionian Islands were not a Colony; they were a Protectorate, and their cession was no justification or precedent for our giving up our Colonies. It might serve to guide them in their estimate of the relation of the Colonies to us if they remembered that, in one of his despatches, the Earl of Carnarvon wrote that any colonist who suffered injustice, whatever might be his class or colour, had a right to protection at the hands of the Colonial Minister of this country. If that principle applied to an individual, how much more did it apply in the case of a whole Colony. He did not suppose that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) would defend the giving up of a Colony which had been so long connected with us, and a Colony which protested against being given up, and handing it over to a country with a totally different Government and a totally different religion. He rather thought there must have been some blunder in public opinion as to the feelings or views of the right Gentleman; but it was certainly remarkable that the French had sent their Admiral to the Colony to prepare them for the cession. He wished, before it was too late, to press upon the Government to consider what would be the effect upon other Colonies if they asked Parliament to cede Gambia. It would lead to universal distrust. Gambia was no expense to us, and he hoped, therefore, that the House would not sanction the policy of transferring it to France. While he was on this colonial subject, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government would not take into consideration the expediency of amending the Colonial Governors' Pension Bill, so that a Governor serving six years should be entitled to a pension?

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of all Papers relative to the contemplated transfer of the Colony of Gambia to France,"—(Sir John Hay.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that as he had been some years ago at the Colonial Office, the question before the House was one in which he took considerable interest. He would not, however, enter into the general subject on this occasion, but would content himself with asking the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Monsell) two questions, on which he wished to have a distinct answer—first, whether the inhabitants of Gambia had been, or would be consulted as to their desire to be transferred to France; and, secondly, whether the Board of Admiralty had been consulted with respect to the importance of the Colony as a naval coaling station in the event of war; and whether any correspondence had passed between the Admiralty and the Colonial Office on the matter? No Colony, he might add, great or small, ought, in his opinion, to be transferred to another nation against the wishes of its inhabitants, or without Parliament being consulted before the good faith of the country was so far pledged that they could not, with honour, withdraw from the engagement. Those transactions, he might add, were watched by the great commercial communities such as that with which he was connected, with much jealousy, and it was on all accounts most desirable that they should not be carried out without due time for the fullest consideration being given to all those who were concerned in them.

MR. MONSELL said, he thought the House would go along with him if he declined on the present occasion to be led into a general colonial debate. He must, at the outset, protest altogether against the supposition that it was the intention of the Government to part with any territory which might be truly called a British Colony. He felt as strongly as any man that one of the noblest prerogatives which belonged to this country was that of establishing all round the world Colonies which would, in the future, develop into nations of our own race, but it would be a degradation to apply that ennobling idea to a small territory which after we had had it in our possession for 200 years contained only 47 European inhabitants. Before entering further into the subject he might state, in reply to the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), that while the Government would be ready to consider what was due to justice in the case of the Colonial Governors, he could not promise that any alteration would be made in their position. In answer to the noble Lord who had last spoken he might add that no such correspondence as that to which he had referred passed between the Admiralty and the Colonial Office. The Papers asked for by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) he should have no objection to give; but in reply to his hon. and gallant Friend's remarks, he must observe there was not and never had been any intention of handing over the settlement of Gambia to the French without, in the first instance, consulting Parliament, and the honour of England would in no way be pledged in the matter without giving Parliament the fullest opportunity of pronouncing an opinion upon it. In every statement that had been made to the French Government that was put in the front; every arrangement that had been made with them was made subject to the consent of Parliament, and that consent would be asked for probably before the close of the present Session. His hon. and gallant Friend relied very much on a statement made by Mr. Brown, but in a letter which was written by Mr. Brown and the principal merchants of Gambia on the 12th of August, 1869, they gave the following description of the Colony:—

"This small trading community, on a sandbank 38½ miles in length and one mile broad, the half of which is an uninhabitable swamp, . . . and has a population of about 4,000, of whom about 50 only are European."

Now, he should, in the next place, observe that the question of the cession of Gambia did not originate with Her Majesty's Government. It had been suggested, after a visit which he paid to that settlement, by Sir Arthur Kennedy, a similar suggestion having been made a few years ago by the late Governor Blackall, who gave it as his opinion that it would be advantageous both to France and to England if they would come to some definite understanding, by which mutual jealousy and interference might be avoided, adding that he would advise the adoption of that course even at the cost of an exchange which might, in the first instance, appear disadvantageous. His successor, Sir Arthur Kennedy, in a despatch dated the 13th of March, 1869, wrote as follows:—

"The European population is insignificant in number and never likely to increase. The situation of the settlement renders it very unhealthy for four months of the year. This evil may be mitigated, but never wholly remedied, at the cost of extensive and expensive drainage works."

The Gambia Settlement was not only unhealthy for Europeans, but it was unsuitable even for the Africans. In the Blue Book published in 1866 or 1867 there was a statement that between the years 1857 and 1866 the number of births was about 1,200, whilst the number of deaths was 2,300, and that it would be impossible to preserve the Colony from extinction but for immigration. Sir Arthur Kennedy went on to say—

“The revenue, depending as it does mainly upon the export of ground nuts, must be always precarious and fluctuating. A deficiency of revenue for 1869, as compared with 1868, to the extent of £3,667 is expected. The nature of the surrounding population forbids the hope that civilization or British influence can ever be greatly extended, and peace can never be enforced or expected for any lengthened period among a population where such discordant religious elements exist. Almost the whole bulk of trade is in French hands—produce paid for in cash and carried in French bottoms to French ports. The producing portion of the population belongs to unsettled, wandering tribes, who hire and exhaust the land and then go elsewhere. This system of cultivation will soon render the land valueless, and of course lessen the amount of produce. An outlay far exceeding the amount at present to the credit of the settlement is required to erect a wharf, rebuild the Government House, and drain the swamp. The turbulent and aggressive character of neighbouring populations renders the maintenance of a military force necessary at a serious expense. Lately there were 15 officers of all ranks to superintend 120 men. A militia is impossible. The position of Bathurst is, in a military sense, indefensible, and would prove a source of embarrassment in time of war as it is of serious expense in time of peace.”

Such was the opinion which had been expressed by the Governor General of the West African Settlements in the course of last year, and it was in consequence of the information which he had conveyed to them that the Government were induced to take the matter into consideration. Now, the question was one in dealing with which the present Earl of Derby had, he thought, hit the nail on the head when, referring to Gambia and other settlements on the West Coast of Africa, he said—

“When I say they serve no useful purpose, I mean that they do not answer the end of promoting our trade, because I suppose nobody imagines that we increase our political influence or military power by retaining them. We ought to view this simply as a question of trade.”

For the sake of trade it would or would it not be advantageous for us to keep the settlement; and he would be able, he thought, to lay before the House facts which would completely satisfy them on that subject. He found that the value of the imports into Gambia in 1869 was £94,207, of which only half came from Great Britain. The value of the exports was £91,000, of which only £20,000, or about one-fifth, were to Great Britain. The number of ships entered was 188; of which 34 were from Great Britain, 21 direct from France, and 90 from Liverpool and Goree. Of the 34 from Great Britain 20 were mail steamers, whose aggregate tonnage was 15,700. Deducting these 20 from 34, 14 remained, representing 3,286 tons, against 111 French vessels, with a tonnage of 11,495 tons. Of 198 vessels which cleared from Bathurst, 39 went to Great Britain, 110 to France. Of the 39 to Great Britain 19 were subsidized mail steamers. There were four English commercial houses, two conducted by resident principals, all restricting their business; and four French houses extending their business. Trade by barter, which was the English system, was being superseded by cash transactions of French traders. The French capital considerably exceeded the English. Much of the revenue was derived from growth of ground nuts, which were now being grown in the Southern States of America. It would be seen by those figures that the exports and imports of Gambia were, so far as we were concerned, absolutely insignificant, and that the great mass of the trade was getting into French hands. Under these circumstances, the Colony being really of no advantage to us, and Sir Arthur Kennedy having given it as his opinion that it would be a good exchange for us that France should abandon her claim to interference with or sovereignty over the Monah and Samo country, and we give her Gambia, the Government had taken the subject into their consideration. Acting on that same principle, the Government were negotiating with Holland for the purpose of obtaining, and he believed they would obtain, a very valuable possession belonging to her on the Gold Coast, which would tend to consolidate our territory, and lead not only to the expansion of our trade, but the civilization of the Natives; for nothing operated more to the injury of our interests, and to check the progress of civilization in that quarter, than the conflicts which were constantly occurring between the Natives, who were protected by different Powers. We could not, it should also be borne in mind, continue to keep possession of Gambia without entailing on ourselves considerable expense, especially for military purposes. The idea of the Colony going on without support from any civilized power, and being able to maintain itself against the warlike tribes, was quite absurd. In times of peace the Colony might be able to get on, but in time of war it must claim assistance. The liberty of the people in respect of their religion was a point that had been strongly insisted upon in the negotiations with France, as well as the protection of their lives, property, and civil liberties. The care taken to protect religious liberty had, perhaps, been more than was necessary, for he did not think there was any country in which there was greater religious liberty than there was in France. In order to ascertain the feelings of the population with respect to the proposed transfer, Sir Arthur Kennedy, Governor of Sierra Leone, was sent to the Gambia, and he reported that he could hear nothing to induce him to believe there was any serious opposition to the transfer, and that he felt more than ever convinced of the soundness of the policy of Great Britain in endeavouring to divest herself of a responsible charge, the possession of which offered no equivalent advantage. He supposed it was not expected that they should take the votes of the people by a plébiscite, and he did not see that they could have got at the opinions of the people by any means other than those which they had adopted. As he had said, all the questions raised would be very carefully considered by the Government, as would every statement made by the merchants, who had been invited to make representations of the losses they were likely to suffer; for, while the Government felt that it was to our interest that this settlement should be got rid of, they also felt strongly that we were bound to protect, as far as possible, private interests. In these respects, therefore, he was able to give the hon. and gallant Gentleman the fullest assurances. With regard to the whole matter, no step would be taken which would in any way commit this country to the cession without everything being laid before the House; and his conviction was, that when the whole question was fairly submitted, and when we considered the unhealthy climate of the settlement, the moral and physical effect of it upon the people we sent there, and the great advantage that we should derive from the cession France made to us, the House would come the same conclusion as the Government had arrived at, that it was for our interest that the cession, or rather exchange, should be made.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the question was wholly unconnected with party, for the negotiations on the subject had been carried on by three successive Governments. They were begun by Lord Clarendon in 1866, and were continued by the late, and then by the present Government. The question simply was, whether the proposed exchange would be advantageous to the interests of this country or otherwise. No one could suspect him of any inclination to consent to the cession of any territory of the Queen in any part of the world, for when the cession of the Orange River Territory was proposed he stood alone in opposition to the project—and the year before last he only consented to an exchange without diminution of territory on the Gold Coast. He maintained that no cession or exchange should be completed without the knowledge of Parliament. No one could regard the Gambia as a Colony in any sense whatever. It was a mere settlement or station, established by us first for the purpose of carrying on the slave trade, and afterwards used for the suppression of that trade. It had been regarded of late merely as a station for carrying out the anti-slave trade policy. The settlement could not be of any importance to the trade of this country. The trade, such as it was, being almost entirely in French hands; no English mercantile interest whatever existed for maintaining that settlement. With respect to its use as a coaling station, he believed it would be as useful to us on that account if it were in the hands of the French, because if war broke out the question as to who would get the coal stored there would depend on which Power was master of the seas at the moment. It had been said that it was a most eligible station, and that the Gambia was a fine river. Time was when a great desire existed to get hold of every fine harbour throughout the world and hold it as a station; but the feeling of the country now was that it was not desirable to lay hold of stations all over the globe, because by so doing our naval strength was uselessly scattered. The reasons for retaining the Gambia were of a trivial and sentimental nature; but the reasons against so doing were unanswerable. It was a station absolutely pestilential to English constitutions, and the advantages ought to be very great indeed for maintaining it at such an enormous sacrifice of life. There was no portion of the West African Coast which was more certain to become the scene of tribal warfare very soon than this settlement at the mouth of the Gambia. At this very moment the Mahomedan tribes in the interior were pressing the coast tribes down towards that point. The French had an enormous military station on the Senegal, and as they seemed to be in love with tribal wars it would be better to let them undertake and enjoy them. They had, in fact, began already. If by a change of station we could get out of these wars and strengthen our position lower down, leaving the French to fight coming battles, he did not think we should have reason to regret any loss of glory. The West African Committee of that House came unanimously to the conclusion that it was advisable for the country to get out of all their responsibilities and liabilities along the West African Coast, retaining only Sierra Leone, and the idea of the Committee was that self-government should be as speedily as possible developed and fostered among the people of these settlements, in order that we might soon abandon them, securing, of course, the interests of merchants and settlers during our occupation. As to the merchants and traders at the Gambia Settlement, they would be as well cared for and protected by the French as by us. If the English merchants thought a garrison useful, the French would supply them with one three times the size this House would ever allow this country to place there. The question was not at all a question of a party character; but it was one which affected the interests of the country, and he could not conceive that anybody would entertain much doubt that the interests of this country would be served by the exchange which was contemplated—for it should be borne in mind that what was proposed was not a cession, but an exchange. Our station at the mouth of the Gambia was only 200 miles from the French military station at the Senegal, while it was 500 miles away from our nearest station, Sierra Leone; and it was proposed that the French should give us an undisputed right to several stations nearer to Sierra Leone about which there was dispute at present, and that we in exchange should give them the Gambia station, which was practically already French. He hoped there would be no unnecessary delay in completing the negotiations on the subject.

COLONEL SYKES said, that while we ought to feel obliged to the French for taking this pestiferous spot, we ought to remember that the people, some 3,000 or 4,000 in number, including 50 Europeans and four English houses of trade, were British subjects, and ought not to be transferred to a foreign jurisdiction without their own consent. He was not satisfied with the Report of Governor Kennedy as to the means he took to elicit the opinions of the people, for he simply said he "understood" and "believed" there would be no objection on their part to the transfer. The people had been living under English laws, and they would find those of France quite different, and they ought distinctly to be informed of their probable future position. He wished, further, to call attention to the risk incurred by the Ministry of compromising themselves with Parliament by negotiations for transferring our territory without the previous consent of Parliament.

MR. MONSELL said, he had already stated that the French Government had been informed that no step would be taken in the matter without the consent of Parliament.

COLONEL SYKES said, he was speaking generally, and if Parliament refused to sanction a proposed transfer the Ministry would find themselves in a false position.

MR. EASTWICK said, no proper answer had been given to the questions whether the transfer would be made with or without the consent of the inhabitants, and whether the opinion of the Admiralty had been taken as to the propriety of retaining the settlement for a coaling station. The chief object which the Governor of Sierra Leone would necessarily have in his mind in his inquiries would be the improvement of his own Colony. Regarded as a coaling station, if the place would be as valuable to us in the hands of the French as it was in our own, why should we not at once transfer Malta and Gibraltar to the French? The rule, if good in one case, would apply to all our possessions. To a certain extent, the opinion of the House had been already recorded against this transfer, for the first Resolution of the Committee of 1865 was that it was not possible for the British Government to transfer any settlement on the West Coast of Africa, either wholly or in detail, and if the Committee in the third Resolution pointed to a limited transfer of our possessions; except Sierra Leone, it was done in terms which implied the lapse of a considerable interval of time; and if a cession was to be made at all, it was to be not in favour of a foreign Power, but in favour of a government by the inhabitants themselves. It was the people themselves who were principally concerned, and if they were opposed to transfer to the French no Government in the world, and least of all the English Government, should think of transferring them against their wishes. In this case there was a population of 20,000 speaking the English language, and it would be inconvenient and calamitous that they should be subject to the rule of those whose language they did not understand. Then the people were all Protestants—chiefly Wesleyans and Baptists, and some of them members of the Church of England; and, of course, they did not wish to be placed under a Roman Catholic Power. In addition, they had been accustomed to a moderate and equitable administration, and as every day their settlement afforded a refuge to those who escaped from the French rule, could they think that French rule would offer them any advantages? No pecuniary advantage would be gained by the transfer, because the revenue of the Colony more than covered the expenditure. We did not know how much harm might not result to the trade of the place by the adoption of that course. There was one consideration which was entitled to great weight, and that was that the presence of the British in the settlement had put an end to many abominations in the locality, such as the carrying on of the slave trade and the cruel practice of human sacrifice, and a revival of that and other horrible customs was dreaded in the event of the withdrawal of the British authority as was stated before the Committee of 1865. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) had described the climate as pestilential; but he saw lately a gentleman who had lived in the Colony for 20 years, and his appearance was quite as good as that of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. T. HUGHES said, the people of the settlement were British subjects, and it must not be forgotten that besides the 50 whites, there was a large negro population, the descendants of those who had been taken out of slavery by our ships, and placed there under the guarantee of the British Government. We were responsible for them, and for maintaining our jurisdiction over them as long as they chose to submit to it. It was quite time that we should recognize no distinctions of colour in free citizens. It was said that the settlement would be as well, and perhaps better protected under the French Government than under ours; but as the French settlement at the Senegal was a purely military settlement, there was no doubt that the French, if they went to the Gambia would carry out the same system and would be constantly at war with the neighbouring tribes, and great misery would be inflicted on the people. He felt bound to protest, especially after the serious news which had only just reached the House, against handing over the Gambia Settlement to a Government which, before all things, was a purely military Government. That would be the very worst policy and that policy he would never sanction.

Mr. HEYGATE said, they had now received a clearer declaration of the policy of the Colonial Office than they had ever had before. That policy seemed to be to take no care of small and insignificant dependencies, which were not likely to be remunerative to this country; and it would be no satisfaction to the people of the Gambia Settlement to learn that if they had been stronger and more powerful they would have had a chance of being better cared for. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman's sympathies would get enlarged during the Recess, and that he would have more consideration for the future for small and weak dependencies, which had been connected with us for so many years. It was a very singular state of things, if our subjects were to be transformed at any moment into Frenchmen, Spaniards, or Dutchmen, without their knowledge or consent.

Sir THOMAS BAZLEY said, he wished to know whether proper protection and security would be given to our merchants and traders under the proposed change? Their interests ought to be properly protected.

Mr. MONSELL said, a deputation of merchants came to the Colonial Office yesterday; and they were informed that the Government felt bound to consider their interests, and they were requested to put in writing the character and amount of the losses they anticipated from the cession of Gambia. Their statement would be carefully considered.

Mr. MACFIE said, this was not a small question, nor a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, but a question of Imperial policy, and he hoped that we should keep the Gambia Settlement for ever.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he must strongly condemn the cession of a Protestant community to the French. The right hon. Gentleman must know very little about the administration of French colonies. But regarding the question from another point of view, and looking at Gambia as a coaling station, there were the strongest reasons against ceding it to the French. If we were at war, and the French happened to be neutral, Gambia would be entirely closed to us; and this would be the more disastrous, because the River Gambia was the only one on the West Coast of Africa which could be approached at all seasons.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

INDIAN FINANCE.

WITHDRAWAL OF NOTICE.

Mr. FAWCETT, who had a Notice on the Paper to move, That, considering the present unsatisfactory condition of the finances of India, and the discontent with which some of the financial proposals of the Indian Government are now creating among the people of that country, this House regrets that it will not have an opportunity of hearing the Indian Financial Statement until the close of the Session, said, he would withdraw his Notice, on the assurance that the Indian Budget would be brought forward on an early day, when he would have an opportunity of making observations on the subject, which were the result of deliberate and careful consideration. In justification of himself, however, he would say that an impression had got abroad, which was strengthened by a recent occurrence, that so little interest was taken by the House in Indian questions that one had only to be broached to lead to a count-out; and he was anxious to show that he, at all events, did attach great importance to such topics. Unless that House was going to sever all connection with, and give up all interest in, the affairs of India, there never was a time in the history of the dependency, when its finances more urgently required the keen and scrutinizing investigation of the House of Commons.

METROPOLIS—ORNAMENTAL WATER IN REGENT'S PARK.

Mr. HARVEY LEWIS, who had a Notice on the Paper to call the attention of the House to the danger to the public health, arising from the foul and offensive state of the ornamental water in the Regent's Park, and to move a Resolution, said, it would be in the recollection of the House that some years ago a very painful accident occurred, in which very many valuable lives were lost, and in consequence of that an arrangement was come to that the water in winter should not be deeper than four feet; and in summer the depth should not exceed five feet. Unfortunately, we had had a very dry summer; and the ornamental water was in a very bad state. On Saturday morning last, however, the First Commissioner of Works had attended in Regent's Park with the medical officer of Marylebone, and, in his presence, made a practical investigation into the subject. He (Mr. H. Lewis) could bear his testimony to the extreme anxiety with which the right hon. Gentleman examined the whole case; the result was that arrangements would be made to have the water thoroughly cleansed, and to preserve an uniform depth of four feet in winter and five feet in summer. This so completely satisfied him that he would leave the matter with the utmost confidence in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, and would therefore withdraw his Notice.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £75,114, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Subordinate Departments."

Sir Thomas Basley

Whereupon Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £73,834, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Subordinate Departments,"
—(Mr. Whitwell.)

—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £2,211, to complete the sum for Privy Seal Office.

(3.) £13,792, to complete the sum for Charity Commission.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, he had intended to bring the whole subject connected with this Commission under the review of the Committee; but after what had occurred that morning he must confess to a certain amount of physical exhaustion, in which, no doubt, many hon. Members shared. He could not help, however, deprecating the practice exhibited in this Vote of subsidizing out of the pockets of the taxpayers those endowed charities which many of them were beginning to regard as very doubtfully useful or politic. If he went into the subject, he could show they were actually bribing them to exist and to multiply. A vast number of these charities did harm rather than good; and he thought that, at all events, an income tax should be imposed upon them which would suffice to defray the cost of the Commission, amounting altogether to £45,000 or £50,000 a year. In the year 1866, the Government promised attention to the matter, and notice was drawn to it in 1867 by an hon. Member. The First Minister called attention to the subject, when out of Office, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had endorsed the view of the right hon. Gentleman; and he (Mr. A. Johnston) believed if a proposal to tax the charities was introduced into the House, it would meet with a more favourable reception than was accorded to it before. Lord Eldon had long ago condemned the way the charity estates were dealt with in this country; and, although things in this regard had improved since his time, they had done so absolutely but not relatively. He (Mr. A. Johnston) had lately been engaged in investigating many of the charities of the City of London; and the waste, improvidence, and misappropriation which had been discovered were such as the House would hardly believe. He hoped the whole subject would receive the serious consideration of the Government.

MR. STANSFELD said, he did not underrate the importance of the subject, but he thought it unadvisable at the present moment to enter into discussion upon it, which must occupy a considerable time. The Report of the Charity Commissioners had however been under the consideration of the Treasury, and the view the Treasury took was that the financial result of their suggestions was by no means in proportion to the exigencies of the case.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £9,612, to complete the sum for Civil Service Commission.

MR. RYLANDS said, he wished to call attention to an increase in the Vote arising from the appointment of a second Commissioner, at a salary of £1,200 a year; and he should like to know under what circumstances that appointment was made?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the practice had hitherto been to have one paid and one unpaid Commissioner; but the work had increased so much, both in amount and in importance, that on a vacancy occurring it had been filled up by the appointment of a second paid Commissioner.

MR. STANSFELD said, that the public economy had rigidly been studied in making the alteration.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he hoped that the Commissioners would take into their own hands the nominations for the Civil Service, so as to prevent the trouble and annoyance to which Members of Parliament were frequently subjected.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £15,008, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission."

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, he would advocate revising the table of fees so as to make this Commission self-supporting. He thought it was high time to stop subsidizing lords of manors, who, as a rule, were not poor people, and he therefore moved the reduction of the Vote by £4,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the hon. Gentleman was rather impatient, for the Act by which these fees were levied had only been in operation about a couple of years.

MR. RYLANDS said, he objected to charges for the benefit of individuals being imposed on the public, and he hoped the matter would be pressed to a Division, if the Government would hold out no hope of reducing the Vote.

MR. STANSFELD said, that the time had not yet arrived for looking into the working of the existing system with respect to these fees; but before next year's Estimates were prepared the Government would be in a position to do so.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £8,250, to complete the sum for Inclosure and Drainage Acts Expenses.

(7.) £28,349, to complete the sum for Exchequer and Audit Department.

MR. RYLANDS called attention to an item of £500, included in the Vote for servants and charwomen.

MR. STANSFELD said, he did not think the charge was an extravagant one, seeing that there were about 130 people employed in the Department.

MR. M'LAREN said, it appeared to him that the Office was overweighted with messengers and porters.

MR. CANDLISH said, that there were no public servants who rendered more valuable services for their pay than the officers of this Department.

MR. RYLANDS said, it was no answer to a complaint of unnecessary expenditure to tell the Committee that the Office was doing its duty efficiently.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask whether the recent commutation of a pension which did not exist had come before the Audit Department?

MR. STANSFELD said, that this error had not arisen through inaccurate book-keeping in any Department, but through the negligence of a clerk—an act against which no system of book-keeping could guard.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £32,720, to complete the sum for General Register Office.

(9.) £10,390, to complete the sum for Lunacy Commission.

MR. WHITWELL said, it was only reasonable that the private lunatic asylums, which were very profitable, and which benefited largely by the visits of the Inspectors, should be made to contribute towards inspection.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £30,550, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Mint, including Expenses of the Coinage."

MR. MUNTZ said, he must complain of the increase of £1,800 in incidental expenses, of which no explanation was given; and a still more serious complaint was the charge for loss on coinage, which was unnecessary. Up to 1856 this loss had been £785 per 1,000,000 sovereigns; but a gentleman who was at one time connected with the Mint had written a book, in which he proved that the loss might easily be reduced to £7 per 1,000,000, and that with proper care of the sweepings there need be no loss at all. The average manufacture per year for the last 30 years had been £3,000,000, and according to this calculation, the entire loss per year would be £21. By voting such a sum as £2,000 they encouraged waste or something worse, for it appeared that in past years there must have been considerable speculation. If, as he was now informed, the sum of £1,800 which appeared in the Estimates was to defray the expenses of a Commission appointed to inquire into the working of foreign mints, he must say he did not think there was any necessity for sending a body of peripatetic philosophers all over the world to find out what could be discovered at home. He moved the reduction of the Vote by £3,700.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £26,850, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Mint, including Expenses of the Coinage."—(Mr. Muntz.)

MR. BARNETT said, he thought that this roving Commission for visiting the various Continental capitals would find that either the coinage or the mints had been made in England, and that a visit under proper auspices to Birmingham would have given all the information wanted. The Commission consisted of a chemist, an engineer, and the Deputy Master of the Mint. The latter was a most valuable public servant, and a personal friend of his own, but his services would be better employed at home. If, as he was informed, a large quantity of gold was given out to private refiners, he thought there must be risk of loss. He wished to know whether there was any truth in the rumour that the Mint was to be transplanted to Somerset House, and that one of the quadrangles of the latter building was to be excavated for its accommodation. Many persons connected with Somerset House thought that placing workshops and smelting furnaces there would be injurious to their health and a great nuisance to them in their work, and that the weight of the machinery above ground might prove a cause of danger to the building itself.

MR. CRAWFORD said, the inquiries of the Commission abroad were not directed to mechanical operations, but to the departmental relations between continental Governments and their mints, and considerable advantage might be expected from such an investigation. He wished to take the opportunity of calling attention to the efforts which were being made to call in light sovereigns through the medium of the Bank of England. He was once asked what was the lowest amount the Bank of England would receive, and he replied that if a single light sovereign were brought there the value would be returned for it. In this way they would assist the Bank in its efforts to withdraw all light sovereigns as soon as possible from circulation. [MR. BARNETT: said he hoped the Bank of England would set the example.] He said every sovereign that went into the Bank of England was weighed; a light coin was never passed over its counter, and he mentioned last year that the Bank lost £4,000 by adopting that plan.

SIR DAVID SALOMONS said, he thought it a great advantage that the officers of the Mint should go abroad to inquire into the practice of other nations. To the hon. Gentleman who last spoke he felt bound on the part of the public and of the bankers to express thanks for assisting in measures which, in all probability, had had the effect of removing a great deal of light coin from circulation. No doubt much credit was also due to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this head, for until those measures were adopted with his concurrence light sovereigns had never obtained their full value. Now, whoever sent light sovereigns to the Mint would receive back their weight in heavy sovereigns.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that some loss must be entailed by coinage, and all he could say was, that the Mint would do its best to reduce that loss to the lowest possible point. The gold coinage every year amounted to about 8,000,000 sovereigns, and he hoped the Committee would not strike off the £2,000, because whatever the waste might be it must be paid, and that was the usual estimate of loss. He hoped it would be possible to reduce the loss; but in the meantime it was necessary to have the money in hand to cover that which actually occurred, and he must ask the House not to take for granted everything that was to be found in the pamphlet which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz). The author of it was discharged from the Mint by the late Dr. Graham; and being anxious to get back again, and not being successful in the attempt, he had written the work in question. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had made inquiries of a very eminent private refining house, and he was surprised to find that their loss was considerably more than that of the Mint. The metal was extremely subtle and in the process of refining, penetrated everything in the neighbourhood; and he was informed that there was a great deal of money to be made by sweeping the chimneys of the Mint. As to the tour of the Commissioners, he thought seeing it was the intention to move the Mint from its present situation, which was too large and expensive for the object, that it was not an improvident step to send persons about to get hints from foreign mints for the improvement of the establishment in this country. The machinery sent from Birmingham was frequently altered in accordance with the contrivances of foreign inventors, and some of it was not sent from this country. Therefore the Commissioners would be able to get valuable hints with regard to these matters, as well as to the modes of management of foreign mints and their relations with the various Governments. He might remind the House that the gold at the Mint bore interest while in course of manufacture, and if the time consumed in the manufacture were reduced, the expense would be reduced. He, therefore could not regard the money spent on the scientific Commission as thrown away, and the Report which they would prepare on their return would, he hoped, prove the best answer to the objections taken to the duty assigned them. In answer to the question of the hon. Member for Woodstock (Mr. Barnett), he had to state that it was intended, whenever a suitable site could be found, to move the Mint from Tower Hill. It there occupied four or five acres of very valuable ground, while only one acre was really required, and the manufacture was one which did not require a very prominent site. As to Somerset House, his opinion was, though he did not speak positively on the point, that it would not be wise to move the Mint there. It had been suggested that it might be placed near the terrace, fronting the river; but he was sorry to say that the foundations in that part were not very good. The buildings already there showed signs of sinking, and were supported by iron girders; and if they introduced machinery upon the spot it was possible they might do, and certainly they would get the credit of doing, considerable injury. On the other hand, he agreed as to the very questionable nature of the proposal to dig a great hole in one of the quadrangles of Somset House for the purpose. As at present advised, he was not prepared to move the Mint to Somerset House; but there were several other sites in view. The question was still in suspense; but he hoped shortly to fix on a site that would enable him to dispose of the valuable land the Mint now occupied on Tower Hill.

Question put, and negatived.

(11.) £12,262, to complete the sum for National Debt Office.

(12.) £26,265, to complete the sum for Patent Office.

MR. BOWRING said, he would beg to ask whether the Government had come to any decision as to the erection of a Patent Museum at Kensington, in conformity with the recommendation of the Select Committee of six years ago?

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to call attention to the very large fees paid to the Attorney General and Solicitor General in patent cases. He hoped that some means would be taken to improve the system of granting patents.

MR. AYRTON said, the question of appropriating land at Kensington for public buildings would shortly be brought under the consideration of the House. There was some difficulty in settling the exact places. It was necessary to determine on what principle the Patent Museum at Kensington should be constructed. When time had been given for the consideration of the question it would be brought before the House, if there was any project for erecting at Kensington a building for a permanent Museum of Patents. The receipts from stamp duties on patents had always caused much misapprehension. The sums derived from fees and from stamps had been ascertained in former years by the Committee of Investigation.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he thought the whole subject of patents was in an unsatisfactory state. It seemed to him that the Law Officers of the Crown received from fees on patents larger incomes than the First Lord of the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor.

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not grudge the Law Officers their fees; but objected to the money coming out of the pockets of unfortunate inventors, who it seemed were in future to be required to do work that had been done for them hitherto by the Patent Office.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought the Law Officers were a much misunderstood class, especially in the matter of fees. For a fee of one guinea, or at the most two guineas, specifications were examined by a staff of clerks who had to be kept for that purpose. Patentees would in future be required to provide abstracts of their specifications, because they could do so better and cheaper than the work could be done at the Patent Office.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, the Law Officers' fee was not a large one, but that was a small item in the cost of a patent, which amounted to £175. Some persons thought that patents ought to be abolished altogether. He did not share that opinion. He had given Notice to move for a Committee to inquire into the working of the Patent Laws with a special view of cheapening the cost of patents to working men; but it was now too late in the Session to enter upon such an inquiry. He hoped there would be an inquiry into the subject next Session. Some of the most useful inventions had sprung from working men, and it was the duty of Parliament to afford them every encouragement.

MR. WALTER said, he thought the Committee would do well to let the question remain in its present position until they were able to deal with the Patent Laws. He was not prepared to recommend the cheapening of patents until the country had made up its mind as to what patents ought or ought not to be. It was well known that under the present law the great majority of patents were delusions and snares; they were worth nothing to the unfortunate persons who had taken them out at great expense. He had nothing to say against patents, but as they were blockades against the whole world, they ought to be bond fide substantial things. Under the present law a vast number of patents were merely a misnomer and hindrance to inventors.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK suggested that the Law Officers should be paid by salary instead of by fees.

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA—QUESTION.

EARL RUSSELL: I wish to put a Question to my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs on the subject of the late negotiations respecting the differences between France and Prussia, of which I have given him private Notice. It is now unhappily but too certain that the calamity of war has befallen Europe. The first intimation we had upon the subject was by the statement of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs on the 5th July; and some days afterwards an announcement was made that France would declare war, and I have since heard that that declaration of war has been sent to Berlin. Now, if the French Government had stated what were their grounds for declaring war, and had not the French Chambers unanimously approved the course of their Government, I should not, as a Member of the British Parliament, have thought of putting any Questions on the subject, unless upon a regular Motion in this House; but it appears that the French Ministers have represented Her Majesty's Government as approving the course they have pursued. On the 11th of July, M. de Gramont said—"Up to the present all the European Cabinets appear to admit the legitimacy of our complaints," and on the 15th M. Ollivier, the Prime Minister, said—

"We commenced negotiations with the foreign Powers to invoke their good offices with Prussia, in order that the legitimacy of our grievances might be recognized. The majority of the Powers admitted with more or less warmth the justice of our demands."

Now on these statements of the French Minister several questions arise. Of course, no one would wish my noble Friend to undertake the responsibility of doing more than he has actually done with the laudable purpose of preventing war; but I wish to ask him, in the first place, whether he will make a regular statement such as was made in 1823 and 1854, in the former year with reference to the failure of the negotiations for preventing a war with Spain, and in the latter year with reference to the war with Russia? I wish, secondly, to ask, whether the "approbation with more or less warmth" of Her Majesty's Government simply applied to the belief entertained by the French Government that they had good ground to complain that Prussia had sanctioned the candidature of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern for the Spanish Throne without informing France of it, or whether it extended to the threat of war, which was part of the communication made to the French Chambers at the same time? I ask, in the third place, whether the approbation of Her Majesty's Government—assuming that such approbation was given—extended to the further demands which were made by the French Government after the nomination of the hereditary Prince of Hohenzollern had been withdrawn; and I wish to ask why, if it was necessary in the view of the French Government that there should be a declaration to the effect that the Prince should never hereafter be a candidate for the Spanish Throne, that demand was not addressed to Spain, which was the Power supposed to be about to accept him? I think it would be more convenient if, instead of our asking for information on particular and incidental points, my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would make an explicit statement, in the manner I have already intimated; but I think that, at all events, the House and the public in general have a right to know the truth as to this negotiation—short as it was, and which has ended so disastrously—and what part was taken by our own Government. I have not myself the slightest doubt that my noble Friend did not approve anything which he ought not to have approved, and that his efforts were directed to the maintenance of peace in Europe; but it is desirable that such information should be communicated to the public through the medium of an official announcement on which they may rely. I will not add another word, for I do not wish to enter into any discussion as to whether France was justified or not in its demands, and Prussia in its refusal.

LORD CAIRNS: I also wish to put a Question to the noble Earl, which he, perhaps, may find it convenient to answer—namely, Whether, in the present state of affairs on the Continent, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose to Parliament any measure for the amendment of our law for the enforcement of neutrality of our subjects in accordance with the recommendation of the Commission which sat a few years ago?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it may be more convenient if I first answer the Question which the noble and learned Lord has first put to me. The recommendation to which he refers was made all but unanimously by a Commission which was very ably constituted, and its object was to strengthen the power of the Secretary of State with regard to suspected violations of neutrality—and especially with regard to the fitting out of vessels of war in British ports. I am glad the noble and learned Lord has put the Question, for it implies his continued belief in the wisdom of that recommendation. My reply is, that it is my intention immediately to introduce a Bill for that purpose. With reference to the Questions of my noble Friend (Earl Russell) I would first remind him that in the private Notice which he was good enough to give me, he mentioned two Questions only, one of which he has omitted to put, and that he did not mention the three last. I can only say that, of course I am most desirous to withhold no information from the House. I stated the other day what was the beginning of our policy, and added that we had continued to adhere to it—promising to lay before your Lordships at the earliest opportunity all the Papers connected with this very sad event. That promise I hope to perform in the course of a few days. I am entirely in your Lordships' hands, but I cannot help thinking that it would be more convenient, and perhaps fairer to the Government, that your Lordships should have those Papers in your hands before I make a general statement. I should prefer to make such a statement when liable to be corrected by what your Lordships have been able to read, instead of asking you now to accept an ex parte statement. With regard to the apparent discrepancy between the statement of M. de Gramont and my statement in this House, I am happy to say I believe there is no difference as to the facts which I then stated. I believe that neither M. Ollivier, nor M. de Lavallette, nor M. de Gramont could in the slightest way impugn the perfect accuracy of what I said. I think, indeed, your Lordships will see that I said less than the Papers warranted me in saying. I understand, however, that it is not as to facts that there is any difference, but that M. de Gramont has drawn an inference—which is always of course a matter of opinion. That inference, which I do not admit, he thinks he draws from the fact that most of the European Governments certainly exercised their influence in promoting some peaceful solution of the question. That, however, is a question which your Lordships will be better able to judge of when the Papers are before you; and, therefore, with your Lordships' permission, I will make no statement till that time, when it will be my duty to make the fullest statement possible. It is unfortunately too true that yesterday evening a declaration of war was forwarded from Paris to Berlin. That will necessitate an immediate proclamation of neutrality on our part. I am happy to say that a fortnight ago our relations with France, with Spain, and with Prussia were all of the most friendly character; and although during the last 10 days we have used the strongest language compatible with their dignity and our own self-respect, I am happy to state I believe that language has not affected those friendly relations up to this time. Whatever may be the habit of free discussion in this country, I am quite sure your Lordships will think that Her Majesty's Government are bound to maintain that attitude of dignified reserve which will best enable us to maintain our rights as neutrals, to show perfect impartiality and justice to both parties, and in the end, when these clouds give signs of passing away, to act with more usefulness whenever there is a chance of restoring peace.

ROYAL MINT.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

LORD KINNAIRD: I rise to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the past and present management of the Mint, and although I very much regret that it is the intention of the Government not to assent to my Motion, I feel bound, nevertheless, to call your Lordships' attention to the mismanagement of the Department to which my Motion refers. It will be in your Lordships' recollection that when the Coinage Bill was under consideration I moved for certain Returns connected with the gold coinage, my object being to show that considerable loss occurred in the process of coining. Some of those Returns were granted, but others were refused on the plea that they were too voluminous to lay on your Lordships' Table. But I have made inquiries, and find that refusal was made because the officials of the Mint did not wish for any searching inquiry, and because the Returns would have exposed certain malpractices connected with the coinage. I also moved, when the Bill was in Committee, for certain Returns connected with the coinage of silver and the transactions between the Bank of England and the Mint. I was informed on that occasion that no record was kept of those transactions; I saw at the time that was a subterfuge, and that the officials knew these Returns would disclose certain malpractices at the Mint which they would prefer were not made public, for not only is a record of these transactions kept but the Returns could be granted with ease. I have found, however, that a Return has been presented to the House of Commons, which gives me the principal part of the information I desired to obtain by the Returns for which I moved. That Return, I have heard said, is not strictly correct; but it is a Return presented to Parliament, and as far as the figures to which I wish to refer are concerned I have reason to believe they must be correct. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) who answered me on that occasion, admitted that as regards the gold there was great loss in coinage. He said that although the Government was not supposed to make money by the gold coinage, they made a considerable sum by the silver; and at another time (on the 24th March) he said that although there was a loss resulting from keeping the silver up to the proper standard, through wear and tear, yet on the manufacture there was a profit of something like £20,000 a year. Now, I am not going to hold the noble Marquess to any statement he made on that occasion, because not being himself connected with the Mint he must have been dependent on the officials; but I can assure him that statement is entirely erroneous. It is quite true that a profit was made in the Mint in the year 1859 of £27,032 on the coinage of silver, and this arose from the large quantity coined and the very small purchase of worn coin.

Lord Kinnaird

£647,064 worth of silver was coined in that year as against a yearly average of £341,018, and the purchase of worn coin amounted to only £8,096 as against the average of £14,633. But although this profit of £27,032 was made in this year, there was a loss of £5,373 during the next nine years. Now, my Lords, as regards the coinage of silver, there should be an uniform profit. The price of silver is 5s. 1d. or 5s. 1½d. per ounce, so that there should be a profit of 7½ per cent upon the silver coin. In 1868 the sum purchased was £312,252, which should have yielded a profit of £23,368, but the Return showed a loss of £10,896; so that, adding the loss on to what the profit should have been, we find that the Mint was £34,265 on the wrong side that year in its silver coinage; but inasmuch as the loss on the purchase of worn silver was £18,058 in that year, the net loss to the Mint through mismanagement was £16,207. Now, what became of that sum of money? How has it disappeared? The noble Lord admits gold was abstracted during the process of coining, and I say that the loss now arises from speculation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself contradicts the noble Lord, and admits that there is a loss on silver, for in the Estimates I find he asked the House of Commons to vote £1,000 to make good the loss on silver, in addition to £15,000 for the loss occasioned by repairing that coinage for the coming year, which has to be paid out of the pockets of the people instead of the Exchequer being replenished by the legitimate profit of £20,000. But the most extraordinary loss is in the coinage of copper. One ton of copper costs about £100, and when converted into coin it is worth £358, giving an actual gross profit of £258; yet I find the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked for £1,000 last year to make good the loss on the copper coinage. I have been rather amused to find the Chancellor of the Exchequer speaking slightly of the loss on the gold coinage, saying in all probability it went up the chimney. I think it is more likely to have gone up "the spout." Now, I find another item in the Estimates of £1,800 for the expenses of an inquiry into foreign mints. This represents the expenses of three gentlemen who are going to inquire into the method of coining adopted on the Conti-ment; but, on inquiry, I find that nearly all the machinery in use in foreign mints went from this country, so that we could ascertain all we want to know about the practice in foreign mints, by making inquiries of certain engineering firms in this country. I may be told that the foreign mints may have improved on the machinery supplied to them, but even this may be ascertained without going to this enormous expense. Moreover, most of the coining on the Continent is done by contract, and it is not likely that contractors will give a Government Commissioner, who is competing with them by advertisement, much information as to the way in which they carry on their work; so that altogether this £1,800 will be completely thrown away. And who are the gentlemen commissioned to make this inquiry? The Deputy Master is one of them—a most excellent, financial man; but, unfortunately, he knows nothing of the practical part of the business, and will gain very little by his trip. Then there is Mr. Roberts, lately appointed chemist to the Mint; he is to go, but his qualifications for the post are very doubtful. Ever since the Mint was taken out of the hands of those contractors who were called the “moneymen,” the appointments there have formed one uniform system of jobbery. The appointments were regarded as political prizes, and so distributed; but an outcry was raised, and matters were smoothed over by appointing two scientific men successively to the office of Master of the Mint. Neither of them, however, knew anything of the process of manufacture, and their management was signalized by increased losses. Then we were told this would all be done away with, but now we have another nice little job perpetrated by the appointment of Mr. Roberts, a gentleman of no very great talent, to the office of chemist. Well, Mr. Roberts is to go on this Commission of Inquiry, and the third gentleman is Mr. Napier, one qualified in every respect for the duty, but for all that the very last man who should have been sent. In 1858 a sum of £1,100 was set apart for the purchase of a filing machine in accordance with an estimate sent in by Mr. Napier for the purpose; but, before the order was executed, an officer in the Mint made a machine answering every purpose which cost only £60, and nobody knows what became of this £1,100. I believe this Commission is going to Spain, but Mr. Napier manufactured the machinery in use there, so he is going to Spain to see how his own machines work, and he is to receive £2,000 for doing it. Perhaps, however, as the war has broken out the trip will be postponed. Now, my Lords, what I say I am prepared to substantiate before a Committee, and I challenge contradiction. That an inquiry is needed even at this late period of the Session is patent, for the House of Commons has only recently voted no less than £18,000 to make up the losses in the Mint. I have been told that Mr. Fremantle and Mr. Rivers Wilson have made a report on the subject of some of these complaints, and have suggested improvements; but these improvements would have no effect upon the working of the establishment, and would not touch the main defects in the system. One of the alterations made in consequence of that report was a revision of the scale of wages. Formerly the workmen had a retaining fee varying from 6s. to 10s. per week when unemployed, and a certain wage beside when at work. But the pay was very small, and it was thought this might lead to speculation. The scale has accordingly been revised by the payment of £1 per week as retaining fee, but the revision is calculated to give the men a little less on the whole, a result to be expected when the arrangement was made by so skilful a financier as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the country saves £100 a year out of the workmen's wages. But the most extraordinary part of the revision is to come; and this affords another instance with the sugar duties, hawkers' licences, and the gun tax, of the readiness with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer jumps to conclusions, without being at the trouble to inform himself upon the subject in hand. The workmen are by this new scale to receive less when coining gold than when coining silver, although the temptation to speculation is greater; so that at the time when their honesty should be secured by good payment, they are to be treated with a niggardly hand, and who can be surprised if they help themselves? The noble Marquess says there has been only one case of dismissal for speculation; but, if he inquires further, he will find there have been 12. No prosecution has followed these dismissals nor even an inquiry. Prosecutions would not be palatable to the Mint authorities, because they would expose the system. Now, I can assure your Lordships, that these statements I have made are true in every respect, and I challenge contradiction; and I trust the Government will think the facts really demand a searching inquiry. More than a year since, I brought the subject before the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it was pooh-poohed, and I was told that a private inquiry would be made: but no inquiry has been made, and the system remains unamended. I therefore move for a Select Committee, to inquire into the past and present management of the Mint.

Moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the past and present management of Her Majesty's Royal Mint.—(The Lord Rossie.)

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I regret that it is my duty to decline to accede to the Motion of the noble Lord, but I feel sure your Lordships will admit, when I have made a brief statement of the facts of the case, that the Government is warranted in refusing the Committee. I must admit that two cases of peculation have occurred at the Mint; but the persons concerned were dismissed, and there has been no reason to suspect a recurrence of the practice; I am sure, therefore, the noble Lord is under a misapprehension, when he says there have been 12 cases of dismissal for peculation during the last few years. As regards the charge of wasteful management, I must repeat the statement I made on a previous occasion. The noble Lord, I fear, confuses two things—namely, the loss occurring from the necessity of keeping the silver coinage up to the proper standard, and the gain which accrues from the coining; and, on the whole, there is a distinct gain, although I may, on a previous occasion, have overstated the amount. There is, notwithstanding the information of which the noble Lord appears to be possessed, a gain of £5,000 a year on the silver coinage. The amount of waste on the gold coinage has, within the last few years, been extremely moderate: it is, at present, 1s. per £100; and an eminent firm of refiners in the City have given an opinion that this is very satisfactory. So much for the past. With regard to the present, I must say that as the Department has recently been reorganized, it would be hardly fair, before it had got into full working order, to institute an inquiry. The staff has been reduced, thus effecting a saving on this year's Estimates of £5,000; the system of the payment of wages has been altered, resulting in a small saving and in a marked effect on the staff; and the melting and coining departments have been united, avoiding that apparent confusion between the accounts of the two departments, which has, in some respects, misled the noble Lord. Lastly, I come to the Commission of Inquiry, which has been travelling on the Continent. Now, if the machines in use on the Continent have been mostly made at Birmingham, much may be learnt, as to their application and the character of the metals used, by the proposed inquiry. As regards the members of that Commission, I must say the noble Lord spoke in scarcely justifiable terms of Mr. Roberts, who is a very eminent chemist, and has proved his capabilities by devising a system for depriving gold of the obnoxious properties on which the noble Lord recently commented. The noble Lord did not fail to admit that Mr. Napier was eminently qualified for a post on the Commission; and, as regards the Deputy Master, he has exhibited great abilities in discharging the duties of his office, and I do not think the noble Lord has said a single word to show he has forfeited our good opinion. I have only a single word to add; and the noble Lord must forgive me if I speak candidly. The noble Lord will recognize this book which I hold in my hand; it contains the larger portion of the charges made by the noble Lord; and I ask him whether it is good that he should endeavour to throw discredit on a recently re-organized Department upon the basis of a pamphlet written by a discharged official of that Department?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I rise in consequence mainly of a remark made by the noble Lord on a previous occasion, which has occasioned considerable pain to the relatives of a late very distinguished public servant. As a personal friend of Professor Graham, the late Master of the Mint, a man of great eminence in all scientific matters, I feel it my duty to notice an imputation on his fidelity made by the noble Lord on a former occasion. On inquiry at the Treasure, where there was no interest in defending the memory of a dead man, I have found that there was never a shadow of suspicion on Professor Graham's perfect integrity. There have been, no doubt, small cases of speculation, as, I take it, there always must be in a Department dealing with such valuable materials, and where many workmen are engaged; but they are detected as promptly as possible. I am afraid the noble Lord has been influenced by a clerk who was dismissed, or ceased to be employed, during Professor Graham's Mastership.

LORD KINNAIRD: I am quite ready, as far as Professor Graham is concerned, to acquit him individually and personally from anything improper; all I have to say with regard to Professor Graham is that he was not a fit person for the office, as he continued the jobbery which he found in existence and which had prevailed there ever since the Mint was a Government office. He appointed his own brother, a calico printer, to an office for which he was entirely unfit not only on the ground of general incompetence, but from his well-known habits of intemperance. I am quite ready to admit that the bulk of the information I possess upon the subject is obtained from Mr. Ansell, who was for many years employed by the Master of the Mint, and who, as the Returns show, succeeded in making even the gold coinage a paying department, as it should be, instead of a losing department, as it is; but my statements are also founded on, and confirmed by, Returns presented to both Houses of Parliament. Mr. Ansell also put a stop to speculation, and made himself very unpopular among the officials in consequence. Mr. Ansell gave up very valuable appointments in order to fulfil his duties at the Mint, under the repeated promise of promotion when a vacancy should occur; and I am afraid I am responsible for what is called his dismissal, for, when I applied to the late Prime Minister for his promotion, Mr. Graham, who, in common with the other officials, feared an exposure from Mr. Ansell's promotion, wrote him a letter of dismissal as follows:—

"Royal Mint, Sept. 28, 1868.

"Dear Sir,—I regret to have to inform you that it is not in my power to continue your present engagement as an extra officer in the Coining Department, while the Mint is only so partially occupied as it has been for some time past. Your assistance will not, therefore, be required beyond the 31st of December next.—I remain, faithfully yours,

"G. F. Ansell, Esq." "THOMAS GRAHAM.

After this dismissal the profit ceased and the loss recurred. I accordingly applied to the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer for an inquiry; but I was treated rather summarily, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he deprecated any inquiry. Only two or three months, however, after giving him that notice, and while he was still engaged in the Mint, Mr. Graham warmly recommended him for the office of Gas Inspector to the Corporation of London, stating that he was a well-informed practical chemist, and "a man of tried integrity." Within three months after the Master of the Mint dismissed this officer—who, as the Returns will show, had saved the country some thousands—he writes this testimonial—

"I beg to express the very favourable opinion which I entertain of Mr. G. F. Ansell's qualifications for the office of Inspector of Gas to the Corporation of London. Mr. Ansell is a well-informed practical chemist, and has given much attention for several years to gas. He is the inventor of an ingenious instrument for indicating the presence of fire-damp in the atmosphere of mines, which is much admired by scientific and practical men. Mr. Ansell is also a man of tried integrity and great energy. From what I have seen of him at the Mint I would say that he would devote himself entirely and conscientiously to the work of the new office, if appointed."

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Who signed that letter?

LORD KINNAIRD: Thomas Graham. And, notwithstanding this high testimony to the value of his services, this man was dismissed because he knew too much of what was going on in the Mint. I challenge the Mint authorities to prove a single statement in his book to be false. If they can, why do they not contradict him? They dare not. Mr. Ansell's book has been some months before the public, and if the Mint could have challenged his statements, which are very damaging, they would certainly have done so. I challenge contradiction. I am very glad the noble Lord has given me the opportunity of making this statement with regard to Mr. Graham, a talented man, but quite unable to cope with the clever men about him, unaided by Mr. Ansell. Now that Mr. Ansell has been dismissed, you see what is the result. The noble Lord has told your Lordships of reforms which have been made at the Mint; but I can assure him I expect little good to result from those reforms, for the very men who then had charge of these departments, and who permitted the peculations and mismanagement which Mr. Ansell stopped, are the men who are now promoted to the chief management of the operative departments of the Mint. I hope, therefore, the matter will not be allowed to drop, for I am sure there is no Department in this or any other country more corrupt than the Mint.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE rose to explain. In the Table published by Mr. Ansell, the operation of melting appeared to have been left out of sight. The coining operations had been put forward, but the losing operations were kept behind. The statement in the memorial, in respect to the alleged promise made to Mr. Ansell, was absolutely without foundation.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES BILL.

(NO. 190.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the measure originated in representations made to him when President of the Board of Trade. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Cave), then Vice President, undertook to deal with the question; but a change of Government caused the measure to be in abeyance for some time, and when, subsequently, it passed through some stages in the House of Commons, Mr. Cave's illness necessitated its abandonment. He believed the present President of the Board of Trade was favourable to legislation on the subject, though, owing to his prolonged ill-health, he was not committed to any of the details of the Bill; and the Parliamentary Secretary of the Board (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), had rendered material assistance to Mr. Cave in its preparation—especially on some of the legal points which it involved. Admitting that Government should not interfere too much with private undertakings, he (the Duke of Richmond) did not think the Bill went further in this direction than the Regulation of Railways Bill, passed during his presidency of the Board of Trade, which required railway companies to render accounts in a uniform manner, and to give shareholders the fullest information of their business transactions, which, he believed, had worked extremely well. Up to this time policyholders in assurance companies had had no voice, and little or no information, as to matters which deeply affected them. They represented something like £400,000,000, or half the amount of the National Debt, and no class of sufferers from the commercial disasters of the last few years was more to be pitied than policyholders. One company was transferred to another behind their backs; and he might mention as an instance that the Tontine Office was transferred to another office, the latter to the English and Irish Church, that to the British Nation, and that again to the European. The policyholder must either submit to such transfers or sacrifice all the money he had put by for his family; and one of the objects of the Bill was to put him on the same footing as the shareholder, by giving him a voice in questions of amalgamation or the transfer of business. The Bill also provided that life accounts should be kept separate from all other accounts, and all receipts in respect of life assurance carried to a separate fund, so that greater security would be afforded to the policyholder. It was further provided that statements of accounts should be prepared and laid before Parliament every year. Upon that point Prussia was so careful that she required insurance companies to obtain a concession from the Government before granting any life policies; they were then bound to show the amount of their receipts and expenditure; while the Government reserved to itself the right of withdrawing the concession should it any time deem the company to be in an unsatisfactory condition. Another provision of the Bill was that every company should, before commencing business, make a deposit of £20,000, to show that it was a bond fide undertaking. The result of the Bill, if passed into law, would be that small bubble companies would not come into existence, while strong companies would be much better managed. The latter part of the Bill would place the policyholders in the same position before the Court, with respect to the winding-up of the company, as that in which the shareholders stood now. The result of its operation on the whole would, he felt satisfied, be to affect most favourably the interests of those provident people who sought to make provision for their families by giving a fresh stimulus in that direction, and thus tending to increase the welfare and prosperity of the country, which the fraudulent proceedings of the last few years had done so much to check.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY was understood to say that the Government approved of the general provisions of the Bill.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

BRITISH COLUMBIA BILL—(No. 123.)
(The Earl of Kimberley.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to make further provision for the government of the Colony of British Columbia, which was one of the youngest of our Colonies, and which was somewhat peculiarly situated, owing to the nature of its population, who were for the most part engaged in gold digging. It would be remembered that in 1866 Vancouver Island was united to British Columbia, and made subject to the Legislature of that Colony, which was increased in number, so as to provide for the representation of Vancouver Island. The Council of the Colony at present consisted of five Government officers, of eight councillors nominated by the Governor, and of nine others, who were considered unofficial members, who also had to be nominated by the Governor, but who, practically, were elected by the colonists. The practice, however, was not in accordance with the law; and while Her Majesty's Ministers did not think the Colony was in a position for the establishment of what was called responsible government, they thought it was desirable that she should have a new Constitution, enabling the inhabitants to take a large part in the transaction of their own affairs. It was proposed, therefore, by the Bill that Her Majesty should, by means of an Order in Council, constitute a Legislature, consisting of the Governor and a Legislative Council—in fact, should give to the Colony a new Constitution. The new Council should consist of six Members appointed by the Governor, and nine to be elected by the people. Her Majesty was also empowered to delegate certain powers to the Governor, enabling him, by his proclamation, to determine the qualification of electors and elective members, to divide the Colony into convenient elective districts, to appoint returning officers, issue writs, to take the poll, and determine the validity of all disputed returns; and, generally, to see to the orderly conduct of the elections.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

LORD LYVEDEN pointed out that the Bill would commit entirely to the hands of the Governor the power of controlling every step in the formation of the representative assembly, from determining the franchise of the electors, to the validity of the return of the elected. That he regarded as a great power to intrust to a man who was not in the highest order of colonial Governors. British Columbia was a most important Colony, and it would, in his opinion, have been more constitutional and statesmanlike to leave these details to be worked out in the same manner as had been done in previous cases, instead of deviating from the usual practice by putting them entirely under the control of the Governor.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY explained that the change proposed by the Bill was by no means a large one. It would simply legalize a state of things which already existed in practice.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY BILL.

(NO. 125.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD CAIRNS said, that after the Bill had been read the second time, their Lordships had referred the Bill to the consideration of a Select Committee, which, after examining its provisions with great zeal and diligence, had reported it with considerable Amendments to the House. These Amendments altered the Bill so much that he thought it would be a convenience to their Lordships if he briefly explained them. First of all, then, it was provided that the earnings of a married woman, whether they were wages or the result of trade, or of literary, artistic, or scientific skill, should be treated as though they were property settled to her separate use. The Bill next proceeded to deal with the mode of protecting investments which had been made by married women, whether by means of their earnings or otherwise. Under the existing law a husband might, after giving proper notice, withdraw from an ordinary savings-bank, or a Post Office savings-bank, any deposits placed there by his wife. The Bill, however, as amended, provided that all deposits made in the name of a married woman, or of a woman who might marry after she had made such deposit, should be deemed her separate property, as though she were an unmarried woman. The 3rd and 4th clauses provided that where a married woman, or any woman about to be married and her intended husband, might apply to the Governor of the Bank, or to the directors of any joint-stock company, that any sum not less than £20 of the public funds deposited, or about to be so, and any shares in the company, might be held by them as the separate property of the wife, and the dividends paid to her. This provision was greatly needed, because women who had saved up £100 or so were very unwilling to ask their future husbands to sign any documents with reference to it. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Morley) had given notice of an additional clause dealing with shares in friendly societies in the same way; and this would improve the Bill still further. To all these clauses a Proviso was attached that if any investments were made by a wife with the moneys of her husband, and without his consent, application might be made to the Court in a very summary way; and it was likewise provided that nothing contained in the Bill should authorize the making of any investment in fraud of creditors. With regard to personal property coming to a married woman as next of kin to a person dying intestate, it was provided that it should belong to her for her separate use. In like manner she would have the separate use of land coming to her as heir-at-law to an intestate person. The 9th clause would, in his opinion, prove highly beneficial. At present, if a husband affected a policy of insurance in his own name, intending it as a provision for his family, it became after his decease a part of his general estate and was available to pay his debts. Indeed, as it was one of the assets most easily got hold of, it was usually applied to that purpose. This Bill, however, provided that if a married woman effected an insurance on her own life or the life of her husband, expressing on the face of it that it was intended for her own separate use and benefit, it should enure accordingly. The next provision was a very important one; if a husband effected a policy of insurance which expressed upon the face of it that it was to be for the benefit of his wife and children, it should be deemed a trust for the benefit of the wife for her separate use, or of the wife and children, according to the interest so expressed, and should not be liable to the claims of his creditors; but if the Court should find that the policy had been effected and the premiums paid by the husband with intent to defraud his creditors, they would be entitled to receive out of the sum secured an amount equal to the premiums paid. After these explanations he trusted their Lordships would have no difficulty in going into Committee on the Bill.

LORD PENZANCE said, he thought the Bill as it now stood to be of a practical, workable character. It would enable married women to enjoy the benefit of any money they might have earned by their industry or talents. Even those who were adverse to some portions of the Bill agreed that this particular object ought to be carried out. But when the Bill came up from the other House of Parliament it was based on a very much wider principle, emanating from an altogether different set of ideas. The Bill then proposed to treat a married woman in all respects as an unmarried one as far as property was concerned. Indeed, as far as the utter separation of property could bring about that result, it was a Bill to separate husband and wife. He would not now enter on a discussion as to whether that was desirable or not; but he might be allowed to remark that the opinions of those who advocated the entire separation of husband and wife as regards property had not been accepted by the community. He opposed the Bill when it was introduced into the House, but the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) had now in reality framed a fresh measure.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he believed the Bill would prove one of the greatest social blessings ever brought about by legislation. Women were now closely competing with men as producers; he believed there were as many as 800,000 women employed at wages in England, and putting their earnings down so low as at £20 each, their total earnings would be £16,000,000 a year. Surely that was a sum which should be protected from the violence and rapacity of husbands. But he wished the Bill had also secured to the woman any savings she might have made from her earnings before marriage. One clause in the Bill secured these savings if invested in the savings-banks; that was a good provision as regarded money, because it would encourage providence; but money was not the only property a woman about to be married would be possessed of. How many young women possessed articles of value, such as jewellery and clothes, or had invested their savings in a sewing-machine or a mangle?—yet these were not secured to them by the Bill, and would become the property of the husband immediately after marriage.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Earnings of married women to be deemed their own property).

LORD LYTTTELTON suggested that the Bill be made retrospective in its action.

LORD CAIRNS said, that would be in violation of the principles which guided the legislation in such cases as this. To make this Bill retrospective would be to take from many men what they now believed to be their property. The property of a married woman could not be effectually secured without the intervention of trustees, and the Bill made the Bank or the managers of savings-banks and joint-stock companies trustees as to such property as might be invested; but it was impracticable to protect a woman's earnings before marriage unless they had been invested.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Bill had been greatly improved in the Select Committee, and, he believed, when its provisions came to be understood, women would be quick to take advantage of it. As to particular chattels bought by a woman before marriage out of her own property, it had long been settled that they continued her separate property; and she might protect any property other than that provided for in the Bill by appointing a trustee.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Deposits in savings-bank by a married woman to be deemed her separate property).

LORD HOUGHTON said, it seemed to him that this and the next two clauses were founded on a total absence of principle. Married women were compelled by them to invest their money in one of four different ways—as a deposit in a savings-bank, as a Government annuity, in the funds, or in a joint-stock company, because they provided that if they were not so invested they should not have those savings protected by law for their separate use. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) said they could appoint a trustee; but anyone who knew anything of the habits of the women whom it was proposed by this Bill to serve would know that such a thing as a trustee never entered their heads. What was needed was some simple process by which property of all kinds acquired by a married woman could be secured to her separate use. Why could it not be provided that any property a woman had should remain hers, unless the husband could prove that it belonged to him? He knew of an instance in which a widow married, bringing to her second husband the property of her first, and this second husband died, having willed the property away from the woman and her children.

He hoped that on the Report the question might be placed on some sound principle.

LORD CAIRNS said, he could not admit that the clause was devoid of principle. The principle of the clause was that of carrying into the humbler ranks of life that protection to women that already existed in the higher ranks; that was, that property having been placed in some tangible form, should, through the intervention of trustees, be protected. It was impossible to secure property to the woman unless by pointing out how it was to be invested.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (As to married woman's property in funds) agreed to.

Clause 4 (As to married woman's property in joint-stock company).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY pointed out that whereas this clause provided that only paid-up shares might be conveyed to the separate use of a married woman, it made no similar provision in the event of the shares not being fully paid up. In the event of the shares, as far as they were paid up, becoming the sole property of the wife, to whom were the directors of a company to look for the payment of the remaining calls upon such shares—the husband being protected by another clause in the Bill from liability for his wife's debts?

LORD CAIRNS explained that the husband would not be liable for calls upon the shares not fully paid up, which had belonged to his wife before her marriage, until he committed some act that rendered him liable at law. He would, however, introduce an Amendment to meet the case referred to by the noble Marquess.

EARL POWIS inquired whether a married woman would have a right to vote at meetings of the company in respect of her shares?

LORD CAIRNS said, she would have a right to vote if the shares stood upon the register in her name.

Clause agreed to.

THE EARL OF MORLEY moved the following new clause after Clause 4:—

"Any married woman, or any woman about to be married and her intended husband, may apply, in writing, to the committee of management of any industrial and provident society, or to the trustees of any friendly society, benefit building society,<sup>o</sup> or loan society, duly registered, certified, or enrolled under the Acts relating to such societies respectively, that any share, benefit, debenture right or claim whatsoever in, to, or upon the funds of such society to which the persons or persons so applying is or are entitled may be entered in the books of the society in the name of the woman as a married woman, entitled to her separate use; and it shall be the duty of such committee or trustees to cause the same to be so entered, and thereupon such share, benefit, debenture, right or claim shall be deemed to be the separate property of such woman, and shall be transferable and payable with all dividends and profits thereon as if she were an unmarried woman; provided, that if any such share, benefit, debenture, right, or claim has been obtained by a married woman by means of moneys of her husband without his consent, the Court may upon an application under section eight of this Act order the same and the dividends and profits thereon, or any part thereof, to be transferred and paid to the husband."

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Deposit of moneys in fraud of creditors invalid), agreed to.

Clause 6 (Personal property coming to a married woman to be her own), agreed to.

Clause 7 (Freehold property coming to a married woman to be her own), agreed to.

LORD HOUGHTON moved to insert the following clause:—

"If any married woman after the passing of this Act become entitled to a sum of money not exceeding two hundred pounds as legatee under a will, it shall form part of her separate estate, unless the County Court Judge of the district in which she lives shall, upon the application of her husband, otherwise order; and the order of the said judge shall be binding and conclusive on the said married woman and her husband as to all or any part of the said sum so bequeathed."

The Court of Chancery was in the habit of apportioning all legacies to the wife above £200 between the husband and wife. He thought the Bill should do the same thing for the poor woman that the Court of Chancery did for the rich woman.

LORD PENZANCE said, the noble Lord was about to proceed further than the Court of Chancery, because instead of apportioning the legacy between the husband and the wife, he proposed to give it altogether to the latter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought the point deserved attention and hoped the noble and learned Lord would consider it.

Amendment (by Leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

BILL—(No. 202.)

(The Lord Chancellor)

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> (according to Order).

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that the professed object of this Bill was to carry into effect the recommendations of the Royal Commission sanctioned by Convocation. Anything relating to public worship ought not to be regulated by Parliament merely, and probably in future such changes would be made in the same way as the changes now before the House had been made. But an Amendment had been introduced in Committee which was not in accordance with those recommendations — on the contrary, it was opposed to them. In the second part of the Bill, as it now stood, there was this passage—

“Upon special occasions, to be approved by the Ordinary, other Lessons may, with his consent, be substituted for those which are appointed in the Table of Lessons.”

The word “special” had been introduced in Committee. Now, this was completely contrary to a decision come to by the Commission after full deliberation, for on a division the recommendation as it originally appeared in the Bill was carried by 14 votes against 10. He thought that such a change should not have been made without any notice whatever. Indeed, he must protest against the introduction of any changes in the recommendations of the Commission, as it would serve as a precedent for introducing changes in Parliament next year, when the other and more important recommendations of the Commission would probably come under consideration. He asked their Lordships to reinstate the original wording of this part of the Bill by striking out the word “special.”

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL said, that the introduction of the word had been made in Committee by the Archbishop of York, on the recommendation of several of the clergy, who thought it would conduce to the more effective working of the Bill; and he himself had concurred with his most rev. Friend in the advisability of the Amendment; but at the time he forgot the discussion and the decision on the subject by the Commissioners; but even now he must say that he thought it would be better for the Ordinary that the word “special” did precede “occasions.” The real point had been whether or not they should leave it to the discretion of a conscientious clergyman, who objected to the reading of Lessons from the Apocrypha, to use other Lessons in their stead. The danger was that if the word were omitted, the clergy would not deal fairly with the Bill. He would speak frankly as far as one man could speak for another. When he said that when clergymen asked leave to omit the Apocrypha, on the ground that the feelings of their people were much opposed to it, he should consider that a special case. After all, it only referred to one or two Lessons in the course of a fortnight in the year. He thought, therefore, that the word might be retained.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that when he recommended their Lordships to agree to this Amendment, he was not aware that the matter had been discussed by the Royal Commissioners, and that they had agreed nem. con. to omit the words. The Archbishop of York, who had also been in favour of the words, was also ignorant of these circumstances; and therefore he thought that the words ought to be struck out.

EARL STANHOPE was understood to be in favour also of omitting the word.

Word “special” struck out.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE BILL—(No. 212.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the measure was introduced in fulfilment of an obligation into which he entered a short time since, when his noble and learned Friend Lord Westbury brought before their Lordships' consideration the fact that there was a very heavy arrear of appeals from India, which could not be heard by the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, owing in a great degree to the present constitution of that Court, and owing also to some causes which existed in India. He had himself stated that one of the difficulties connected with the constitution of the Judicial Committee was that Judges of the Superior Courts were made ipso facto members of the Judicial Committee by the Act establishing that tribunal; but that, with regard to all other persons, there was only a power of appointing two persons to sit at one time as members of the Judicial Committee. The choice being thus limited, it was found that the members actually holding other judicial offices had little time to attend to the business of the Judicial Committee. The Chiefs of the Courts of Common Law could hardly on any occasion attend; the Master of the Rolls attended from time to time, and also one or other, and sometimes both, of the Lords Justices of Appeal. The retired Judges who were members likewise attended. There was a great advantage in putting on the Committee eminent members of the Bar, who, having retired from practice, were yet willing to devote themselves to this duty. At the present time nobody was under any obligation other than a moral one to attend the sittings of the Judicial Committee; and it was very difficult, under the circumstances he had mentioned, to maintain the Court as a tribunal sitting regularly de die in diem, like the other tribunals of the country during Term. The object of the present Bill, therefore, was twofold—firstly, to increase the number of persons who might be placed by Her Majesty on the Judicial Committee; and, secondly, to secure a special payment to a certain number of members—namely, four—of the Committee, in order that those who received such special payment, independently of any pension to which they might be entitled, should be held bound to attend the business of the Judicial Committee, as all other Judges were bound to attend the Courts to which they were attached. To effect that object, what the Bill proposed was this—to authorize Her Majesty, after the passing of the Act, by warrant under Her sign manual, to appoint two persons who had filled the office of Judge of any of the High Courts of Judicature in India, or the office of Legal Member on the Council of the Governor General of India, to be members of the Judicial Committee; and it was proposed that there should be paid to each of those persons, during the time he serves as member of the Committee, a salary not exceeding £1,000 a year in addition to their pensions. In the case of the Chief Judge of the High Court of Calcutta retiring, he received a pension of, he thought, £2,000; and the Legal Member of the Council of the Governor General also had a considerable pension on his retirement. In addition to their pensions, those persons, on being appointed members of the Judicial Committee, would each receive £1,000 per annum; by which means he thought there would be no difficulty in securing their regular attendance, except during the vacations, for the despatch of appeals coming from India. It was proposed also to take power to appoint as members of the Committee any of the following persons, not exceeding two—that was to say, any person who had held the office of Judge of the Supreme Court of any possession of Her Majesty other than India, and any person being a barrister of not less than 15 years' standing; and each of them would be paid an annual sum, including any pension to which he may be entitled, so that the whole shall not exceed £2,500 a year. In that way it was thought they might place on the Judicial Committee members of the Bar who, having attained eminence and distinction in their profession, might be desirous of retiring to the quiet and much more dignified position of holding an office in which they might be eminently useful. He thought there would be no difficulty in finding men of that character in whom the public would have perfect confidence. The Bill further authorized the payment to any member of the Council other than those holding judicial office, or those appointed under this Act, an annual sum not exceeding £500. This especially referred to any of the retired Judges who might be members of the Judicial Committee. A Judge desirous of retiring from the Common Law Courts or the Court of Chancery had a pension allowed him. If he retired from the Common Law Courts he saved the expenses of the circuits, or about £500, and he would also have the £500 now proposed to give him, making a difference to him of £1,000 a year altogether, in addition to the pension he actually received. In that manner it was thought they might obtain for the Judicial Committee members who would undertake the positive duty of regularly attending its sittings in the mode he had described. Lastly, the Bill contained a clause enabling the Judicial Committee to sit, if it thought fit, in two sections. That, he hoped, would have the effect of disposing of the present arrear of appeals from India, because they might place in each of those sections—having thus secured members bound to attend—a Judge from India, and also another Judge under an obligation to attend from the two members to be appointed in addition to the present Judicial Committee. And they would only want in each case a third person to preside, who might be found among the ordinary members of the Judicial Committee, all of whom now attended from time to time, but most of whom did not think it reasonable that they should be under the actual necessity of attending regularly from week to week and from day to day in the way in which the ordinary tribunals sat. There had been intimated to him some objections with reference to the appointment in the first instance of the Judges in any Court in India, and it had been suggested that in some Courts there were native Judges whom it would not be desirable to appoint as members of the Judicial Committee. It was not, however, very probable that they would be Privy Councillors, and none could be appointed who were not; but, if it was thought desirable, there could be no objection to confine the appointment to the Chief Justice in each Court; while, with reference to the colonial Judges, the appointment might be limited to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of any Colony. Although at present there was not an instance of any person being made a Privy Councillor who had come from any part of Her Majesty's dominions other than India, yet he had known at least one Canadian Judge who would have been a very suitable person for such a position; and he could not but think that, as the importance of colonial tribunals increased, there might be found coming from the Cape, from Canada, or from Australia, some who would be worthy of being placed on the Judicial Committee. Under these circumstances, he trusted that their Lordships would be disposed to read the Bill a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD CAIRNS said, that although from the state of the House it did not seem that much interest was taken in this Bill, yet it was a subject of great public importance, on which he desired to make some observations. With regard to the 2nd clause, which gave power to appoint two Privy Councillors who had held the office of Judge in any High Court of Judicature in India, there ought to be a clear and positive definition on the face of the Bill as to what persons could be appointed and what offices they must have held—because owing to the constitution of the High Court of Bengal there might be appointed persons who would be quite unsuitable for the Judicial Committee, and who had never had a case argued before them. The practice had been to treat the Chief Justice of Bengal as a person who was ex officio qualified to sit on the Judicial Committee, and he thought it would be desirable to continue that practice. There were now three ex-Chief Justices of Bengal, two of whom had rendered very efficient service, and he regretted that power was not taken by the Bill to appoint all three—the amount of remuneration, if it was limited, being divided among them. By the 3rd clause it was proposed to appoint on the Judicial Committee any person who had held the office of Judge in the Supreme Court of any country other than India, and the consequences might be the appointment of the Chief Justices of Sierra Leone, the Straits Settlements, Gambia, the Mauritius, or any of the Colonies whose Chief Justices were of a different stamp from those whom it was desirable to appoint on the Judicial Committee. To the 4th clause there was a still more serious objection, its object being to give to Judges who were entitled to a retiring pension a sum of £500 a year, in addition to their pension for their services on the Judicial Committee. There was in this country an ample scale of retiring pensions for Judges, and attached to the receipt of those pensions there was always considered to be the obligation—no doubt an imperfect one—to give some portion of their time to the transaction of the judicial business of the country. As soon, however, as there was introduced a system of picking and choosing and bribing a retired Judge with £500 a year extra, an end was put to the honourable understanding which now prevailed; for it was utterly impossible to maintain that obligation when a payment was made to some persons for their attendance, and he hoped his noble and learned Friend would consider that point. He also trusted that a reconsideration would be given to the proposal to divide the Judicial Committee into two portions, a step which he held to be quite unnecessary and which might lead to the effect of their decisions being weakened.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the division was not to be permanent.

LORD CAIRNS said, that at any rate for some time there would be two divisions by whom decisions would be given. At a further stage of this Bill, when he hoped it would attract more interest, he should invite the attention of their Lordships to the points he had enumerated.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought his noble and learned Friend had misunderstood the effect of the last clause. It was not intended that there should be two permanent divisions; but changes might be made from time to time, so long as it was necessary to have two divisions, and any number of combinations might be made of the members of the Judicial Committee. Comment had always been made on the decisions of the Committee, and, he feared, it would continue to be made.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, till to-morrow, a quarter
before Five o'clock.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, as the Public Prosecutors Bill, which was withdrawn at his suggestion on Friday 8th July, had the support of the Government, and the Treasury had drawn up and agreed to the money provisions to be inserted in it, and as the Bill moreover had been considered and amended by a Select Committee of the House, he will give an assurance that the Government will deal with the question early next Session?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, the hon. Member was, doubtless, aware of the circumstances under which this Bill was withdrawn, and he (Mr. Bruce) was under the impression that it was withdrawn with the full assent of the promoters. He could not pledge the Government to deal with the question next Session, because it had not yet received the consideration it deserved.

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA—THE WAR—PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY.

QUESTION.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT: I beg leave, Sir, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury this Question, of which I have given him private Notice, Whether, having regard to the hostilities now unhappily imminent in Europe, it is the intention of the Government to issue a Proclamation, warning the subjects of the Queen to abstain from all participation in such hostilities, and to observe the Laws now in force for the maintenance of the neutrality of the United Kingdom in time of war; and whether, in accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1868, it is the intention of the Government to introduce at once a measure to amend the existing Law, and to strengthen the hands of the Executive Government, in order the better to enable them to enforce its observance?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is the intention of the Government at the proper time—and I am afraid I must consider it certain to arrive—to issue a Proclamation of Neutrality to the effect and for the purpose described by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford; but in point of technical regularity the proper moment cannot be said to have arrived until either a declaration of war has been issued, or until actual hostilities have commenced. [Mr. OTWAY at this moment placed a document in the right hon. Gentleman's hands.] At the moment when I am speaking, my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has placed in my hands a telegram which has just been received from Lord Lyons at Paris. He states that the French Minister of Foreign Affairs has informed him that a declaration of war was despatched to Berlin yesterday, and that as soon as he hears of its arrival there it will be communicated to the Prussian Chargé d'Affaires. That being so, the matter has reached the point at which it will be the duty of the Government at the earliest period—probably to-morrow—to issue a Proclamation of Neutrality. With respect to the second Question, it is our duty to introduce at once a measure to amend the existing law, and to strengthen the hands of the Executive Government, in order the better to enforce its observance. The Government have taken into consideration the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1868, and, without pledging themselves to precise principles, I may say it is their intention to introduce a Bill for the purposes to which my hon. Friend refers—namely, to secure the more complete and effectual fulfilment of all obligations that may be considered to attach to us in any contingency, under the Law of Nations, with respect to ships departing from our ports.

UNIVERSITY TESTS BILL.—QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government see any reasonable prospect of the University Tests Bill being proceeded with this Session, after the decision arrived at in "another place" on Thursday the 14th?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, at the present moment the Government are unable to form a positive opinion; but they do not despair of carrying the Bill through Parliament during the present Session, notwithstanding the effect of a Motion recently carried in the House of Lords. The first conclusion they were inclined to form was that that Motion was fatal to the measure; but from what they have since learnt, they think it their duty to wait a few days before allowing themselves to assume with certainty that that decision must necessarily be fatal to the Bill. Of course, it will be their duty to arrive at their conclusion with a due regard to the substance of the Bill and the object it has in view.

MILITARY PRECAUTIONS IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a Question, not as it had been mutilated by the printer, but as he gave Notice of it. It was to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is aware that the local magistrates of Cookstown, county Tyrone, were consulted as to the necessity of sending troops to that district for the 12th July; whether in spite of the local magistrates having declared it to be quite unnecessary, and that there was not the slightest probability of any disturbance, a force consisting of thirty-four Dragoons from Dundalk, a company of infantry from Armagh, forty-seven constables, and two stipendiary magistrates from the South of Ireland were sent there; and, in addition, the Surgeon of the Scots Greys from Dublin, whose services could not be required, there being some of the best medical men in Ireland in that neighbourhood; and, what expense was entailed on the county by the movement of so large a force?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, in reply, that his information did not enable him to say whether the local magistrates were consulted upon this matter; but he had no reason to suppose that any expression of opinion such as was referred to in the Question of the hon. and gallant Member was given by them as a body, whatever one or two individuals might have said. The preservation of peace on certain anniversaries in the North of Ireland was sometimes a difficult and responsible duty on the part of the Irish Government, and on the occasion in question they were fully aware that meetings of one party were announced to take place in the district. Such meetings always involved danger of a collision with another party; but collisions were often prevented by the presence of a sufficient force in the neighbourhood. Of course, if they did not take place it was easy to say that the dispatch of a force was useless; but if, on the other hand, disturbances occurred, the Government would be blamed for not having taken proper precautions. Therefore, they only did their duty by following the course referred to by the hon. and gallant Member. As to the surgeon of the Scots Greys, he knew nothing of him. With respect to the expense of these movements, he was sorry to say that no expense would fall upon the district, but on the country at large; he was afraid the expense would be considerable.

CLAIMS OF LORDS OF MANORS TO WRECK OF THE SEA.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether, in accordance with the promise of Mr. Milner Gibson, when President of that Board, he will lay upon the Table of the House Mr. O'Dowd's general report on the claims of lords of manors and others to wreck of the sea within the United Kingdom?

Colonel Stuart Knox

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, in reply, that the Report was of a confidential nature, and he did not think he would be justified in laying it on the Table.

NAVY—ARMOUR PLATES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whom he was glad to see in his place again, Whether he has placed himself in communication with the War Office with reference to the experiments on Armour Plates carried on by that Department; and, if so, whether he has found that the results obtained by the War Office experiments justify the system adopted by the Admiralty of protecting the sides of Ships with single Plates of great thickness?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply, Sir, to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that, after the discussion which he raised in the House during the passing of the Naval Estimates, we communicated with the War Office; and the result is, that in all probability we shall undertake certain experiments as to the comparative advantages of one plate of double thickness and two plates of single thickness, with reference to the 12-inch plates of the Devastation and Fury. The experiments under the War Office are not, in our judgment, conclusive, as iron concrete was interposed between the two plates intended for shields, and that concrete could not be employed on a ship's side.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS ON THE PAPER—WITHDRAWAL OF BILLS.

OBSERVATIONS.

In reply to Mr. ASSHETON CROSS,

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, with respect to the Savings Banks Bill, he feared that it would not be possible to obtain a satisfactory discussion of it during the present Session; and it would, therefore, be withdrawn. He would mention two other Bills with respect to which the Government intended to take a similar course. One was the Mines Regulation Bill, which his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been anxious to proceed with, but it was not now thought possible to secure for it due attention. The other Bill which would not be proceeded with, though it was one of great importance, was the Parliamentary Elections Bill. The Government entertained the hope, as long as hope could be entertained, of passing that measure, and at one time, when great expedition was made with the Education Bill, it seemed likely that it might be proceeded with; but the great length of time since spent, and not unworthily, on the Education Bill had drawn the House on so late in the Session that all the Government could hope to dispose of before the close of the week was the Education Bill and the Irish Land Bill, making at the same time some progress with Supply. Therefore, at the proper time, the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Parliamentary Elections Bill would be discharged.

NAVY—RESIGNATION OF MR. REED.

QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE, after congratulating the House on the return of the First Lord of the Admiralty to his place, said, he would beg to ask, Whether he will explain the circumstances connected with the resignation of the Chief Constructor of the Navy?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I have no objection to give the fullest explanation on the subject, and to avoid mistake I will read the correspondence which has been held. On the 7th instant I received in the country from my Colleague, Sir Spencer Robinson, a letter from Mr. Reed, dated the 1st of July, which had been retained by Sir Spencer, with Mr. Reed's assent, for two or three days. It was in these words—

"I beg leave to place the resignation of my office in your hands for transmission to the First Lord, having accepted a valuable offer which has been made to me by Sir Joseph Whitworth in connection with his large engineering works at Manchester. In taking this deliberate step, which in some respects I take with extreme reluctance, I have no desire to discuss, or even to mention, those circumstances which make the office I have held less desirable than it might otherwise be, especially as they have but little to do with recent incidents, have no special connection with the present Government in particular, and result almost entirely from the very low estimate which all Governments put upon mechanical and scientific skill in this country, as compared with its value in private life. I desire, on the other hand, to say that I have felt, and still feel, the utmost sympathy with those truly great and valuable reforms in Admiralty administration which the present Government has introduced, and with which I have co-operated to the utmost of my ability, and I deeply regret the necessity of separating myself from them. My regret is the less, however, as you have most generously consented to assist the Government in completing them. In resigning, I beg leave to place myself entirely in the hands of your Lordships as to the time of my ceasing from duty; and I shall afterwards, at all times, be most happy to afford any assistance in my power in order to prevent the public service from suffering disadvantage in consequence of my withdrawal. I am most grateful for the very great personal kindness which has at all times been shown me by their Lordships, and I shall never forget the unwearied support which you have for eight years given to my humble efforts to promote efficiency and economy in the construction of Her Majesty's ships. I am particularly obliged to Mr. Childers, the First Lord, for having taken pains to explain to Parliament that the sum of money which has been granted me this year is a tardy payment for designs (involving much expense) prepared several years ago, and I trust it will be understood that I now leave H.M. Service without pension or emolument of any kind, but not without the consciousness that I have most entirely devoted to that service for the last eight years whatever faculty, strength, and energy I may have possessed."

That resignation was accepted on the following day, the 8th instant, in the following words:—

"Sir,—I have received and laid before the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty your letter, addressed to the Controller of the Navy, resigning the office of Chief Constructor. In reply, I am commanded to inform you that my Lords have been pleased to accept your resignation."

On Saturday evening, the 9th, Sir Spencer Robinson received the following telegram from Mr. Reed:—

"If the state of affairs abroad should materially alter my case, I shall feel bound to do my utmost to meet the wishes of the Government. I leave for Blackheath at 3 to-day."

In reply, Sir Spencer asked Mr. Reed if this telegram was to be considered an official communication, and on the 14th received the following letter:—

"I beg leave to state that my telegram to you of Saturday last was official; that I made it under a sense of public duty; and that I am prepared to abide by it."

This letter was answered on Saturday, on my return to town, in these words—

"Having laid before my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty your letter of the 12th instant, referring to your telegram of the 9th instant, both addressed to the Controller of the Navy, and offering your services in consequence of the state of affairs abroad, I am commanded to convey to you the thanks of their Lordships, but to inform you that my Lords do not see occasion to avail themselves of your offer."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to know, Whether the £5,000 which had been awarded to Mr. Reed had been partly for old and partly for new services?

Mr. CHILDERS said, the whole correspondence on that subject was in print, and on the Table. He had explained it very fully on a former occasion.

STATE OF THE NAVY.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Government intend to take any measures to strengthen the Naval Power of the Country, the better to be prepared for any eventuality?

Mr. CHILDERS: I presume, Sir, I shall have the feeling of the House entirely with me when I say that that is not a Question which I can be expected to answer on the present occasion.

PARLIAMENT—MORNING SITTINGS AND EVENING COUNTS.

QUESTION.

Mr. BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the experience of last Friday night does not afford strong ground for making some alteration in the present unfortunate system of Morning Sittings, which enabled any private Member at a few minutes after Nine o'clock to get rid of the business of the evening? It was quite clear that at this season the loss of a night must have a tendency to prolong the Session. During the last 10 years there was only one instance when the Civil Service Estimates were so late in being proceeded with as this Session.

Mr. M. T. BASS said, he hoped the House would come to no Resolution against Morning Sittings. After considerable experience, he must say nothing facilitated Public Business so much as meeting at 2 o'clock, and he should be glad if the House could always meet at that hour.

Mr. COLLINS said, he thought that after the protracted Sitting on Thursday till half-past 5 on Friday morning the count-out on Friday night was a very natural and legitimate result. To have sat again at 9 o'clock would have been most unreasonable. He thought there was no call whatever to make any alteration in the Rule of the House which enabled any hon. Member to take notice that 40 Members were not present.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I must say I think, under the peculiar circumstances of last Friday, no general inference could be safely drawn against the Rule in question.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

(1.) £412,400, Volunteer Corps.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to know, When it would be convenient to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to state the intentions of the Government with regard to the Volunteer Force?

Mr. CARDWELL said, that the Volunteer corps themselves could not be more anxious than the Government were that everything that was possible should be done to promote the continued and increasing prosperity of the Volunteer Service. He would remind the Committee that the Commission which sat on this subject 10 years ago did not recommend that the whole of the expense of this service should be borne by the public. On the contrary, they expressly recommended that a portion of the expenses should be defrayed by private subscription. Since that time, however, there was no doubt that the question had undergone considerable change. As the Committee were aware, a large deputation of Volunteer commanding officers had waited upon his Predecessor in Office, and had asked him to increase the capitation grant by £1. That was declined, and when, on his accession to Office, a similar request was preferred to him, he had also felt bound to refuse it. He was then asked to make an increase of 10s. To that request he was unable to give an affirmative answer; but he had instituted a very careful inquiry as to the real sum at which, as far as they were able to judge, the capitation grant ought to be fixed in order to make it secure the liquidation of all necessary expenses. The examination which he had made had convinced him that to do that it was desirable to make it easy for the Volunteers to earn a capitation grant of £1 15s. instead of £1 10s. But that increase they did not propose to give to the individual private members of the corps. On the contrary, their opinion was that the most desirable thing for them to do was to increase, as far as possible, the efficiency of the officers and non-commissioned officers of the Volunteer corps—an opinion in which he believed those hon. Gentlemen connected with the Volunteer Force would concur. They felt that it was desirable that the officers and non-commissioned officers should be better trained to the performance of their military duties, and with that view they proposed that the eight officers and non-commissioned officers in each company should be able to earn an additional £2 10s. each—an amount which would be equal to an additional 5s. capitation grant over the whole of the Force. Those were the views which he entertained, and, if approved by the Committee, he hoped to have an opportunity, shortly after the separation of Parliament, to confer with some of the most experienced officers of the Volunteer Force upon the arrangements necessary to carry the proposal into effect.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he hoped that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell) would remember that, although it was quite right that the officers should have an opportunity of earning more money, there were many officers who occupied rather peculiar positions; and he doubted whether his right hon. Friend's proposal would have the effect his right hon. Friend imagined. In some instances the presence of an officer, though but rarely given, was necessary to the success of a corps, and the time of others, again, was too much absorbed in trade or business to allow of their devoting themselves so assiduously to their duties as would be necessary. He believed it would be found the opinion of the Volunteer officers, whom his right hon. Friend proposed to consult, that the men ought to be allowed to earn an additional capitation grant by their own efficiency.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he was sorry that a general debate upon the subject of our Reserved Force had not been raised, and that a legitimate occasion so far as could be seen would not now be offered for such a debate. The statement just made by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell) with respect to the Volunteer Force had probably taken those hon. Members who were Volunteers somewhat by surprise, and they could not therefore venture to criticize with that freedom and decision which they otherwise would have done the details of a scheme which they now heard for the first time. It appeared to him, however, that the Government had arrived at a solution of the difficulty which would scarcely be satisfactory to the general body of the Volunteer Force. The Committee, of which he had been a Member, had gone into the matter with great care, but none of the recommendations which they had laid before his right hon. Friend had been approved; and as that Committee had been selected with great impartiality and represented all portions of the country, it could hardly be expected that this wholesale rejection of their recommendations would give much satisfaction. He could not refrain from urging upon his right hon. Friend that which he had often urged before—the necessity of giving the officers a little more hold upon their men. Considering that a great deal of the expenses incurred were now borne by the men themselves, it would not well be possible to impose more discipline upon them as matters now stood. He believed, however, that this object might be attained by giving them some trifling exemptions, such as from serving on juries. Until we had a ballot for the Militia, and exemption for those who belonged to any other arm of the service, we should never have a satisfactory Reserve Force.

COLONEL NORTH said, he took the same view as his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Barttelot), that we should do everything in our power to make the men themselves efficient.

MR. WHITWELL said, he held that any extension of power to the officers, such as had been advocated by the noble Lord (Viscount Bury), would be extremely unpopular. He hoped any additional contribution to the Volunteers would be in consideration of their efficiency. There need be no fear, under present circumstances, that the Volunteers would not be anxious to make themselves efficient. He hoped opportunity would be given them of acquiring in large numbers a better knowledge of drill in connection with the Forces of the Line.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £68,000, Army Reserve Force, (including Enrolled Pensioners).

COLONEL NORTH said, he would beg to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman could give any idea of what the Army Reserve really consisted?

MR. CARDWELL said, the present Vote had nothing to do with the Militia Reserve, which was liable to be called on for foreign service, and whose number was complete at 20,000. The latest Returns, with regard to the Army Reserve, showed that the First Class Reserve amounted to 2,108, and the Second Class to 18,507, or a total of 20,615.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £374,900, Control Establishment, Wages, &c.

(4.) £1,428,300, Provisions, Forage, Fuel, Transport, and other Services.

(5.) £551,300, Clothing Establishments, Services and Supplies.

(6.) £820,400, Supply, Manufacture, and Repair of Warlike and other Stores.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the question of which he had given Notice on Vote 15 with regard to ordnance experiments had better be raised on Vote 12, which they now had reached. However, if he received an assurance from his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell), that it was not intended to proceed with the experiments with the Whitworth gun which had been contemplated, and which would re-open the whole controversy, he would not, as he had intended, move to reduce the Vote by £10,000. He held in his hand a correspondence which had passed between a committee which sat at the War Office and the Admiralty since the date of the late discussion, and he was glad to find that the Admiralty, acting under the advice of the War Office, had decided that the point to which he had called attention on that occasion was one well deserving the best consideration. He rejoiced that unnecessary expenditure had been put a stop to; for if it had proceeded, it would have opened the door to a renewal of the whole Whitworth and Armstrong controversy, upon which £94,000 had been already spent.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the correspondence laid before Parliament gave a guarantee that no portion of the Vote for the present year would be expended on the matter.

MR. OSBORNE said, he wished to ask whether there had been any trial of that deadly instrument, the mitrailleuse; and, if so, whether it was to be compared with the field gun? Had not the result been to prove the superiority of the field gun?

Colonel North

MR. CARDWELL said, there had been a trial of two of these instruments—an American and a Belgian. They had both been returned to their inventors for improvements; only one of them had yet come back, but the experiments would be renewed when both were in our possession.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he wished to ask a question with respect to the Martini-Henry rifle. It must be clear, if we were taking measures to arm our men with another deadly weapon, that weapon ought to be the very best that could be procured in the world. The question was, whether the Martini-Henry was the very best? Its admirers said that it was; but others said that a better was to be found. The question he had to ask was, to what test the right hon. Gentleman had put the Martini-Henry rifle in order to prove that it was the best weapon; and whether it had been submitted to some person who was competent to give a decided opinion as to its mechanical construction? He had been told it was defective with regard to its lock and breech-loading apparatus. That was a point of the greatest importance to us as a nation. The weapon served out to the British Army ought to stand all the tests that could be applied. He would like to hear that every opportunity had been and was being given to secure that the best arm should be introduced into the service.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, it was most desirable that the House and the country should be informed what was our exact position with regard to the small arms for the Army. A committee was first appointed by General Peel, and sat for two years at the War Office. It was presided over by Colonel Fletcher, and it recommended the adoption of the Martini-Henry rifle. He was informed that this had been succeeded by another committee, and it was desirable that the House should know something as to its deliberations.

MR. CARDWELL said, the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Barttelot) had expressed exactly his own (Mr. Cardwell's) feeling—namely, that the very best small-arm should be adopted in the British Army. Colonel Fletcher's committee having reported in favour of the Martini-Henry rifle, a limited number of that arm were made and sent to Wimbledon last year, where they were seen by some of the expert riflemen engaged there. Two hundred were made as soon as the machinery was ready, and were now in the hands of the troops at home and in India. Some of the Reports received concerning them were very favourable. Colonel Fletcher's committee was still sitting, and sifted these Reports. Two distinguished Volunteer officers were members of the committee—the noble Lord the Member for Had-dingtonshire (Lord Elcho), and Mr. Ross, the celebrated rifle shot, and they were paying the utmost attention to the question of the lock. They would report finally upon the Martini-Henry rifle, and his desire was that the best possible weapon should be placed in the hands of our troops at no distant period.

Mr. WHITWELL said, he wished to know whether the committee had the power of examining into the merits of every other rifle submitted to them?

Mr. CARDWELL said, he had placed no limitation upon their powers, and he presumed that the committee would exercise their discretion freely.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, it was currently reported that in the French service there was a very superior kind of mitrailleuse. He understood that a committee had examined the weapon, but they had not yet reported upon it, and he wished to know how long that committee had been sitting? If they had been sitting some time, he thought it would have been very advantageous to them if they had had some plan of the French pattern of that arm before them.

Mr. CARDWELL said, he had received no official Report on the subject, though the French mitrailleuse had been described to him personally. He had no additional information to give beyond that which he had already communicated.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, the gun-makers and manufacturers of the country complained that the committee sitting at the War Office was not a judicial committee alone, but also a constructive committee, having power to alter and amend the inventions placed before them. The gun trade of the country thought that that was most unfair, for that they, the gunmakers themselves, were quite able to alter and improve their arms. They considered that the committee was reverting to the form of the old Ordnance Committee, and making alterations in the rifles submitted to them for the benefit of those employed by the Government, and not for the general benefit of the country. The trade thought that the committee should be simply and purely a judicial committee. It was said that there was an arm which was superior to the Martini-Henry, and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) ought to allow the two to be tested together, and reported upon by experienced officers, who had commanded regiments, and who were competent judges of such matters. Our soldiers ought to have the best rifle that could be procured for them, and not one that had been tinkered up.

Mr. O'REILLY said, he thought it most undesirable that the committee should be precluded from suggesting any improvement in the rifles laid before them. The object was to get in any way the best rifle that could be obtained, whether as laid before the committee, or as the result of the suggestions of the committee. He could not see that any injury thereby resulted to private manufacturers, and it would be injurious to the public service to silence the men most competent, from their experience, to suggest improvements. As to the mitrailleuse, it appeared to have been tried in Prussia and other countries, and all the inventions were a good deal alike in principle, that adopted by the French not differing materially from the rest. It consisted of a number of rifle barrels fastened together and worked by machinery, which discharged them very rapidly. Though the experiments tried in this country had not been completed, enough was known of the mitrailleuse to show the practical result of using it, and he believed that it would not prove particularly valuable or dangerous.

Mr. VIVIAN said, he wished to say one word with regard to the abandonment of the Whitworth gun. His hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir John Hay) appeared to assume that the experiments instituted by the Whitworth and Armstrong Gun Committee proved that the Whitworth gun was not a success; but the contrary was the fact. He (Mr. Vivian) had recently read very carefully the experiments made with the Whitworth gun, and the conclusion he came to was that the Whitworth gun had proved itself superior, and very greatly superior, to the other guns which were brought into competition with it. In one instance the committee reported that all the guns were upon an equality; but, with that exception, the Whitworth gun was shown to be superior to all others, and ranges were obtained which were wholly unobtainable by either the breech-loading or the muzzle-loading Armstrong. As to our field artillery, which was in the same condition as in 1865, the breech-loading 12-pounder had proved itself in almost all cases inferior to the muzzle-loading Whitworth and Armstrong, except for boat service, and he could not understand why it was allowed to remain in this inferior state. As to the large guns, the Government had been building 12-inch guns of 25 tons weight; but that weight was not sufficient to allow of the full quantity of powder which a bore of that size would consume being discharged from the gun, and the Government had now adopted the weight suggested by Sir Joseph Whitworth, and all his proportions, in all respects. The superintendent of the manufacturing department at Woolwich had, however, undertaken to produce a gun of the size which should be capable of discharging 120 lb of powder instead of 67 lb; but he thought the arrival at such a result was questionable, considering the metal to be used in the construction of the gun. Sir Joseph Whitworth had succeeded in producing a metal of enormous strength and power, and had satisfied him, and many other hon. Members capable of forming an opinion, that that metal was not liable to the ordinary conditions of steel, in that it would not burst explosively. It was  $2\frac{1}{2}$  times stronger than the metal employed by the Government. A great desire existed at the Admiralty to have the metal tested in guns, and it was a great misfortune to the country that that desire had not been carried out, for if it had been it might have carried us a year forward. Personally, he could not appreciate the reasoning of the Professor who advised the War Office that there was no analogy between the explosion of powder in tubes and its explosion in guns. If Sir Joseph Whitworth's gun had been tested we might have been a year more forward than we were. We should have to wait 6 or 12 months for the completion of the Woolwich gun, and if it were not successful we should then only be just where we were at present. The Government had apparently been much influenced by considerations of expense, for while the Whitworth gun would cost something like £6,000, the Woolwich gun would only cost £2,400. But very few of these large guns could be put on board our ships, and only the very best that could be got should be put on board of them. A 25-ton 12-inch gun, consuming 67 lbs. of powder, could scarcely be so good as a 30-ton 12-inch gun consuming 120 lb. of powder. He trusted no time would be lost in completing this Woolwich gun, so that we might see how we stood, for it was doubtful, indeed, whether the right course had been pursued in declining to order one of the Whitworth guns.

MAJOR ANSON said, he would suggest that Sir Joseph Whitworth should make a gun of his new metal and send it down to Shoeburyness, where it could be tried with the others.

MR. OSBORNE: I am informed that Sir Joseph Whitworth is willing to do that, and that he has submitted a proposal to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Horse Guards. Here we are, on the eve of a great European war, and I believe we are unable to play our part in Europe because we have got into such a muddle with our cheap and nasty system. I say it advisedly, we have pared things down to such an extent that you could not put an army of 50,000 men in the field. I agree with what has been said about arming our infantry with the best weapon; but why should not our artillery also be armed with the best weapon? Sir Joseph Whitworth is known to have greater knowledge of gunnery and of the scientific mechanism connected with it than any other man in this kingdom; and this is admitted by all except those who belong to the jealous ranks of what may be called the regular profession. Has he not revolutionized the armament of this country and of the world? Why, then, is his gun not to have a fair trial? I do not profess to have an intimate knowledge of the matter; but I have taken some pains to inform myself; and I believe that it will be found hereafter, when some other nation gets guns of this metal, that we have committed one of our usual blunders of expensive economy.

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT said, there were two questions involved—one affecting the artillery and the other the metal;

but the two were distinct, and ought to be kept distinct, and their separation would save us from difficulty. That the Whitworth metal was not liable to burst was a theory which it was difficult to substantiate. Some experiments had taken place with small tubes of not more than three inches in diameter, but they could afford no fair test, because the explosion of charges in large guns brought into play a certain set of conditions, the cause of which was unknown, and which destroyed the analogy between such an explosion and the explosion of powder in small tubes. Therefore experiments which were satisfactory with small tubes could not be regarded as satisfactory with large ones, and it was on these grounds that the scientific authorities of the War Office had questioned the value of the experiments which had been alluded to. What would be satisfactory would be that Sir Joseph Whitworth's steel should be further tried in order to test whether it was or was not the best metal. It had been tested in the ordinary way and returned as first-class steel. He believed that the reason of the rejection of the metal by the War Office was on account of its not being quite so dense as some others, and therefore presumably not so strong. While the War Office was quite right in not accepting it as being of extraordinary value, it would be as far wrong if it refused to try experiments until the strength and adaptability of the metal had been tested to the entire satisfaction of their professional advisers. An offer, as he understood, had been made to Sir Joseph Whitworth, that he should supply a tube of his metal as a lining for an ordinary gun, to be tested against tubes of the particular class of metal which was now used. It was said that Sir Joseph Whitworth objected to his gun being dealt with on the combination principle; but he (Captain Beaumont) thought that a more satisfactory trial could be obtained in that way than in any other, and that, under the circumstances, the War Office was justified in doubting whether, on the ground of economy, it was right to commit the Government to the cost of constructing a gun of 35 tons.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he did not wish to enter upon the merits of the Armstrong or Whitworth gun; but distinguished Prussian and other foreign officers had been heard to say that the English were at present armed with one of the worst guns in the world. With regard to the War Office, he entirely agreed with the remarks of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne); he believed it was at present in the greatest state of disorder. Two days ago he heard that on the occasion of the "fatal march" a requisition was made for water-bottles; but when the water was served out, every one of the bottles leaked, and the result was that the Commandant at Woolwich relieved the thirsty troops with two barrels of water. He had also been told that there was the greatest difficulty in finding the proper fuses for shells. He only trusted that if England went to war—though he hoped that would not be the case—the country would not be found as unprepared as at the time of the Crimean War. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) would not be led away by the cry of retrenchment, for those who raised that cry would be the first to turn round on him, if any unforeseen accident occurred. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) had expected that the First Minister of the Crown would have come down that day to say that it was absolutely necessary that some extra Supply should be granted for the Army and Navy. The right hon. Gentleman had not done so; but he (Lord Eustace Cecil) trusted, nevertheless, that no long time would elapse before the country was placed in an efficient state not only of defence, but also of offence, should occasion require.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he had heard that the other day nine regiments could muster only 3,000 men on parade. He should be glad to hear that some decision had been come to in regard to the pattern of field artillery. He wished to know whether it was proposed to substitute for the breech-loading Armstrong gun a muzzle-loading gun, stated to be an improvement on the French pattern?

MR. CARDWELL said, the question of fuses was intimately connected with the use of breech-loading or muzzle-loading guns. There was some doubt whether they had acted wisely in using the breech-loader as a field gun. The committee which had been appointed to consider the matter with reference to India had determined to adopt the muzzle-loader; and he had thought it right, therefore, to send down a battery of those guns to Aldershot on trial. Sir Joseph Whitworth had been asked to supply the Government with his metal, for there were two points to be considered. The mode of making the metal might be the best, while the principle on which the guns were constructed might not be the most perfect. The recent investigations with regard to gun-powder, which were extremely curious, had the most important bearing on this question. The Admiralty first desired to have a 35-ton gun. The matter was referred to the Ordnance Council, consisting of a number of most competent men, and the decision of the Council was unanimous.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he had asked for a Return some time ago with regard to the expenditure incurred in connection with the Armstrong and Whitworth and other large guns, and also with regard to the small bores, but he had not yet received the Papers. He thought there was much to complain of in respect to the enormous expense the country was put to for the trial of guns, considering the unsatisfactory results which had been obtained. If the Government would offer a handsome premium for the best gun there would no doubt be plenty of manufacturers who would compete for it, and that would be a cheaper and surer way of securing success.

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT said, he wished to know whether any money was taken in the Estimates for the construction of the Moncrieff gun-carriage, and whether it had yet passed out of the experimental stage? The carriage was accepted as satisfactory, yet only two or three had been manufactured, nor had any experiments been made as to the effect of a shot or a fragment of a shell on them, though their chief virtue was supposed to lie in their defensive power. We were in the position of a man who should buy a horse for use and not ornament, and yet should never take the animal out of the stable.

MR. WHITWELL said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not be led by anything that had been said about retrenchment in this debate to alter the management of the War Office. He was perfectly satisfied that extravagance did not produce efficiency, and that inefficiency was not the necessary result of economy. He wished to ask how soon the Volunteers would be armed with breech-loaders, as he was satisfied that they were depressed by being armed with an obsolete weapon.

MR. CARDWELL said, the store of breech-loaders had been kept low, because he had not yet got the Report upon the Martini-Henry rifle, and it must be obvious to the Committee that it would not be desirable to make a number of breech-loaders until the new pattern had been determined upon. There were at present in stock only 300,000 Sniders, the usual number being 400,000, and, therefore, as soon as he received the Report on the Martini-Henry rifle, he would proceed with the manufacture of the new breech-loaders. With regard to the Moncrieff gun-carriage experiments had been and would be made, and as to the cost of them he apprehended it would be found in the item for wages in the manufacturing department.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £700,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Superintending Establishment of, and Charges for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs, at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1870 to the 31st day of March 1871, inclusive."

COLONEL GRAY said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the item of £5,000 for the repair of Knightsbridge Barracks, a work on which it was contemplated to spend £12,000. He asked whether it was wise to spend that large sum of money on a building in such a state of repair? The present Chancellor of the Exchequer was one of a deputation some years ago in reference to the state of the barracks, when he strongly condemned them and said they ought to be removed. When the Committee considered the amount it was proposed to spend on the Prince Consort's Memorial, the Hall of Arts and Sciences, and the South Kensington Museum, they would probably agree with him in thinking that it would not be right to spend £12,000 on those barracks. Believing that £1,000 would be sufficient to provide for all present necessary repairs, he moved to reduce the Vote by £4,000.

Mr. Cardwell

VISCOUNT BURY said, he understood that the days of Knightsbridge Barracks were numbered, and that that building was to be removed.

MR. CARDWELL said, he would save his noble Friend the necessity of discussing the matter further by consenting to the withdrawal of that item of £5,000.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the idea of removing Knightsbridge Barracks had been abandoned?

MR. CARDWELL said, the idea had not been abandoned, for it had not been definitely entertained, and he did not know where else the barracks could be put.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he hoped there would be a further explanation on this point, which had caused much public anxiety. While he was in Office the deputation which had been referred to waited on him; after much deliberation he resolved to keep the barracks in their present position; and, indeed, he knew no other place where they could properly be put. The barracks were chiefly objected to by the owners of the houses that had been built in the neighbourhood, and his obvious answer to their arguments was that they had brought their houses to the barracks—to which they could make no reply. By the outlay of a moderate sum the barracks might be made fit for their purpose; but to remove them would be very difficult, and would involve an immense expenditure which he thought was not called for. As the right hon. Gentleman had withdrawn the item for the repair of the barracks, it should be understood whether it was his intention to change the policy of his Predecessor, and side with those whom he might call the enemies of the barracks.

MR. CARDWELL said, he only wished to put himself in precisely the same position as his Predecessor. He did not wish to ask for any money on account of Knightsbridge Barracks, because he had ascertained that this year could be got through without any expenditure on them. With regard to the maintenance or removal of the barracks, he was not prepared to give a positive answer on the subject. He had no other plan, and, therefore, could not say a word in favour of removal; on the other hand, if he knew of any satisfactory plan by which the wishes of the neighbourhood could be met, without inconvenience being given to the public service, he should not think it right to object.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £5,000, for Knightsbridge Barracks, Alterations, and Repairs, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Secretary Cardwell.)

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK begged to call attention to the amount of £3,000 for providing billiard-rooms, an item of which he did not approve, and which he hoped would not be seen in future Estimates.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he wished to ask, whether the Secretary for War had on hand a plan for a model barrack, and whether the time had elapsed during which the right hon. Gentleman felt himself obliged to employ a particular architect? The barrack at Chelsea was a most expensive one, and gave general dissatisfaction.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had not entered upon the consideration of any plan for the new barrack, and was not able to answer the question.

£695,400, Works and Buildings.

(8.) £139,300, Establishments for Military Education.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £50,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Sundry Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1870 to the 31st day of March 1871, inclusive."

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT said, that one of the items—£2,000 for experiments connected with torpedoes—was very small, and as our fortifications were not in so satisfactory a state as they could have hoped, and as the great importance of torpedoes was now admitted by most military men, especially for defensive purposes, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not neglect the opportunity of developing, as far as possible, that important branch of our defensive works.

MR. CARDWELL said, he fully acknowledged the importance of the question of torpedoes; but he would remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the torpedoes were already provided for under a separate head in the Store Votes. This item was only for experiments, and he had been told upon the best professional authority that the sum was sufficient.

COLONEL NORTH said, he would draw attention to the fact that £5 5s. was put down as the public subscription to each of the following hospitals:—St. George's, Brompton Consumption, Convalescent, and Small Pox. Soldiers derived a great deal of benefit from these institutions, and he must express his regret that the subscription was so paltry in amount.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had only asked for the same amount as had been granted in former years.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, the sum which was required for an annual governorship in the hospitals in question had probably been fixed on as the amount of subscription, although no doubt it was very small.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he hoped the subject would be considered before next Session, and that the subscriptions would be increased.

MR. CARDWELL said, he would not pledge himself to ask for a larger sum next year. But if it appeared that we got more than we could reasonably ask for our subscriptions, he would.

MR. MILLER said, he objected to the item of £600 for the salary and travelling expenses of the Inspector under the Contagious Diseases Act. He moved the reduction of the Vote by that amount.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £600, for Salary and Travelling Expenses of the Inspector under the Contagious Diseases Act, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Miller.)

MR. CARDWELL said, the policy of the Act was one thing, and the duty of the Executive to carry the Act into effect was another. While it remained in force the Executive should not be left without the means of defraying the expenses in connection with it. The Inspector was a most meritorious officer.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would remind the Committee that this question had been debated at considerable length when an hon. Member took notice that Strangers were in the Gallery. The question was adjourned till Wednesday next, when a Motion would again be made that strangers be ordered to withdraw. He thought the Vote should be reduced.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Cardwell

(10.) £27,800, Rewards for Distinguished Services, &c.

(11.) £73,000, Pay of General Officers.

(12.) £598,000, Full Pay of Reduced and Retired Officers and Half Pay.

(13.) £155,300, Widows' Pensions, &c.

COLONEL NORTH said, he desired to learn what decision had been come to with regard to Chelsea Hospital, and whether it had been determined, as reported, that the vacancies which occurred should not be filled up?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask what attention was to be paid to the recommendations that had been made that the schools of these hospitals should be made instrumental in training and rearing young men for the Army? Some such plan might be adopted with benefit, and he wished, therefore, to know whether the suggestion was under consideration?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, that the subject referred to by the right hon. Baronet had been under the consideration of the Royal Commission on Education, and their Report would, probably, convey the views of the Members upon the subject.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel North), he had to state that the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals had only just been printed, and there had not yet been sufficient time to allow of its being considered.

MR. O'REILLY said, he trusted that it was not, at all events, the intention of the Government to abolish the Chelsea Hospital before the reassembling of Parliament.

MR. CARDWELL said, it certainly was not.

Vote agreed to.

(16.) £1,220,100, Out Pensions.

(18.) £18,000, Non-effective Services (Militia, Yeomanry Cavalry, and Volunteer Corps).

(Mr. Secretary Cardwell, Captain Vivian.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On Motion, "That the Preamble be postponed,"

MAJOR DICKSON, in rising to move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair, said, he would acknowledge that such a Motion was unusual, and that the ordinary course would be to move the rejection of the Bill on the second reading. But the momentous events now occurring on the Continent fully justified him, as he maintained, in the course he now proposed to adopt. The events which had occurred since the second reading of the Bill rendered it, as he thought, desirable that the House should have an opportunity of considering and of stating its opinion whether it was desirable to experimentalize with our Army at a time when two of the greatest military Powers in Europe were actually engaged in war, and when it was impossible to tell whether we ourselves might not soon be drawn into the struggle. He was not without hope that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) would withdraw a measure which he (Major Dickson) could not help regarding as ill-considered and fatal in its character. He said "fatal" because he believed that if they passed this Bill in its present shape they would destroy that which always had been, as far as its numbers went, the finest Army in the world by legislation which was purely theoretical, and which was opposed to all our experience in the past. That it was an experiment they must all agree, and that it would be fatal to the efficiency of the service he would in a few words endeavour to show to the Committee. If they passed this Bill it must necessarily exclude old soldiers from the ranks. We were making a very great sacrifice for a doubtful result, and indeed no result could compensate for that sacrifice. Many hon. Members, perhaps, supposed that by means of this Bill they would create an Army of Reserve equal in efficiency to the present Standing Army. He cautioned them against such an idea. As far as the cavalry and artillery were concerned, an Army of Reserve was preposterous. It would take a number of years to make a recruit a good horse soldier, and constant drill to keep him in a state of perfection. And if after three years' service they were to send a man to pursue his calling, as a shoemaker for example, was it to be supposed, on being summoned back after two or three years, he would make a useful horse soldier? Not at all, for the probability was that he would be able neither to ride nor to use his sword. Indeed, these Reserve men, when recalled to the ranks, would be little better than recruits, and in some respects they would be worse, because they would have lost the essential quality of ready unquestioning obedience. An infantry soldier might be made to march well in a couple of years; but there were other qualities which could not be attained with limited service—confidence in their officers and in each other, the habit of ready unquestioning obedience, and that esprit de corps which had always been a distinguishing feature in the regiments of the English Army. His noble Friend (Lord Eustace Cecil) had put upon the Paper an Amendment to the effect that no recruit should be enlisted under 20 years of age, and if the Bill was to become law such an Amendment would be quite justified, for else our Army would be composed of men not only young in service, but young in years. On the second reading of the Bill he cautioned the House not to place too much reliance on young soldiers, and compared the conduct of the old regiments in the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny with that of the new. The right hon. Gentleman replied that the Battle of Waterloo had been won by young soldiers; but his hon. Friend (Mr. Scourfield) came to his assistance by stating that the Duke of Wellington had said that if he had his old soldiers he would have won the battle by 2 o'clock. Indeed, had not the Prussians come up in the nick of time, the history of the world might have been changed. It should not be overlooked that under this Bill the non-commissioned officers must be selected from inexperienced soldiers. And what would be the effect on drummers, trumpeters, farriers, saddlers, shoemakers, &c.? As soon as they became skilful they would leave. He had listened in vain for any practical argument in favour of this Bill. It had always seemed to him that reformers of the English Army were apt to shut their eyes to the merits, and to see only the defects of our Army, while in Continental Armies they saw nothing but what was good. They were, therefore, in favour of remodelling our Army according to Continental ideas. But it must strike everyone that any such attempt would be futile unless we went to the root of the Continental system and adopted conscription. But when the right hon. Gentleman took the difference of habits and customs into account, and reflected how impossible it was by legislation to alter the character of a people, he must be convinced that any attempt to introduce conscription into this country would be a failure. If the Secretary of State was going to take Prussia as his model, it was to be hoped he had some better reason than that the Prussians had beaten the Austrians in the late war. If the statements he (Major Dickson) had heard were true, he should be sorry indeed that English regiments should ever take the field in the condition in which some of the Prussian regiments took it during the last campaign. He had been told, upon good authority, that many of the Prussian infantry regiments were neither more nor less than undisciplined mobs; and had it not been for three circumstances, he believed the Prussians would have met with a disastrous defeat. He was not now alluding to the needle gun, which, of course, gave Prussia great advantage. But the facts were, the cream of the Austrian Army was engaged in the south, a large proportion of the Army in the north were composed of Italian troops, who would either not fight at all or were half-hearted in the cause; and, worse than all, the Austrian commanders, instead of attacking the Prussians, executed day after day a series of disastrous retreats; and any military man well knew that constant retreating, while it demoralized and disheartened one's own troops, gave their opponents a courage which they would not otherwise possess. If the right hon. Gentleman took the Prussian Army for his model, he must consider that every male in Prussia had to take service, and therefore if he intended to Prussianize our Army, he must go much further than was now proposed. The Belgian Army was more like what our own army would be under this Bill. In that Army, which was founded on conscription, the men enlisted for eight years, of which they served one-third in the ranks and two-thirds in the Army of Reserve. And what was the result? One scarcely ever saw in Belgium a soldier with hair upon his face; the Army was composed of boys staggering under the weight of their arms, ammunition, and accoutrements. Why not go to France and see what was done there? The French authorities did everything in their power to keep the old soldiers in the ranks. Associations had been formed in France to aid in procuring substitutes for those who did not wish to serve, but upon whom the conscription had fallen; but the Government had taken these associations into their own hands, had fixed the price of the substitutes, and where did they go to look for them? To the ranks of the Army; and they applied the money they received for the substitutes to the relief of old soldiers. As this country could maintain only a small Standing Army, it was the duty of the Secretary of State to see that it was as near perfection as drill and discipline could make it, so that when we had recruits the Standing Army might be the leaven to leaven the whole. But if they passed this Bill the Army would be composed of men young in service and young in years, in whom the Reserve men could feel no confidence, and for whom they could have no respect. He valued an Army of Reserve, but not if it were obtained by sacrificing the efficiency of the regular Army. He need not say that he opposed this measure in no party spirit. He opposed it because this was a dangerous time to experimentalize with our Army, and because he believed the Bill would strike a fatal blow at the efficiency of our Army. With a great respect for the abilities of the right hon. Gentleman, he felt that no statesmanship, however brilliant, and no abilities would, without practical knowledge, fit any man to be Commander-in-Chief of our Army, and the Secretary of State for War was now little else. Theoretical legislation never had produced, and never would produce, efficiency in any Army; and for these reasons he moved that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

MR. O'REILLY said, that he doubted whether the great Duke had ever fixed the exact moment at which he might, under particular conditions, have won the Battle of Waterloo. With reference to the statement of the hon. and gallant

Gentleman (Major Dickson) as to substitutes in France, the system he described had been given up by the Government, and two years ago, when money was wanted, the funds thereby obtained were absorbed for other purposes. As to the Bill, one misapprehension ran through the whole argument of the hon. and gallant Member. He assumed that the scope of the Bill was to substitute universally a three years' service for the Army instead of the present term of enlistment. But that was not the proposal or the object of the Bill. The old term of enlistment was 21 years; this was reduced to 12 years, without any of the ill effects which at that time were predicted, and the object of the Bill was, at the discretion of the military authorities, and in such cases as they thought desirable, to allow a number of men to leave the Army who had served a minimum term of three years. But it was anticipated that a considerable number of men might serve for 21 years, or even for life, and provision was made in the Bill for such cases. The three years' service was not compulsory or universal; it was optional, and by no means universal. Then, the hon. and gallant Member said it was no use to have any but old soldiers. No doubt, in a battalion during war, it was desirable that a considerable number of men should have seen service; but some of the regiments which behaved best at the Alma contained hardly a man who had been under fire at all. Three years were sufficient to drill and train an infantry soldier, and these men, mixed up with older hands, would form the best material for an Army in the field. Then the hon. and gallant Member said that after one or two years of civil life a three years' soldier would be hardly any better than a raw recruit; but the experience of France and Austria did not confirm this opinion. The best soldiers in France were those who had been dismissed on unlimited furloughs but who were now hurrying to their regiments as fast as they could. In France, a law had been passed allowing a short enlistment for the term of the war alone, and with such an example, he thought that, so far from diminishing our military strength, a short term of service would rather increase it. He had frequently expressed the opinion that the only effective way in which we could provide an effective

Army of Reserve for England would be to introduce a system by which there should be in the country a large number of men who had been trained to military service, and who, whether they were receiving a retaining fee or not, would be impelled by patriotism, in case of emergency, to return to the ranks and give us the benefit of their experience. He trusted that the Committee would not accept the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

COLONEL CHARLES LINDSAY said, they were asked, as it were, to stand godfathers to a Bill for which they were responsible when passed into law; and as the name which they were called upon to give it did not represent all the principles upon which the actual enlistment into the Army was to be based, and as they were asked to legislate upon some of those unknown principles, under the title of "Army Enlistment," which had been established since the second reading of the Bill, he would take the opportunity, with the indulgence of the Committee, of remarking upon the unfair position in which those hon. Members who took an interest in Army matters were placed. He considered that the title of the Bill was intended to embrace a great deal more, in connection with what was called Army Reform, than it had presented to the Members of the House of Commons, owing to the alterations which had been recently made in the Royal Warrant of 1866-7, of which the House knew nothing officially. He considered, therefore, that the Committee would be discussing the various clauses under a great disadvantage, unless further information and explanation were given by the Secretary of State. It appeared to him that the provisions of the Bill, as they then stood, were rendered vague and incomplete in consequence of the appearance of a Royal Warrant, dated 2nd June, 1870, which he held in his hand—a Warrant which had been issued since the second reading of the Bill, and which, owing to its date, must have been previously decided upon by the Government, and which, therefore, ought, in justice to hon. Members, to have been announced before the second reading, so as to have put them in possession of the intentions of the Government. That was a document which, he ventured to say, not half-a-dozen hon. Members had ever heard of, and much less seen—a document which would materially affect the future enlistment of the Army—a Warrant which cancelled Article 779 in the Warrant of 1866-7, but of which no one had any official information. What did the Warrant say? It said—

“VICTORIA R., Whereas we deem it expedient to shorten the periods hereafter necessary to entitle the soldiers of our Army to the various rates of good conduct pay, and to abolish the additional pay of 1*d.* a day now granted to men after the completion of their first term of limited service.”

Then came a long string of no less than six classes relating to good conduct pay; but, as they were made up to a period of 28 years' service—which was 16 years beyond the term of service laid down by the Bill—they were not in harmony with the intended conditions of service as laid down for the Army, and they were, to a certain extent, superfluous, and could have no application, as far as the rank and file were concerned. To explain. He would take the scales as far as the 12 years, which was, according to previous explanation by the Secretary of State, to be the extent of a soldier's service. They said—

“That a soldier after having served two years, provided his name had not been entered in the Regimental Defaulters' Book for two years immediately preceding his claim, would receive 1*d.* a day with one good conduct badge, and that after he had served six years, and having uninterruptedly been in the receipt of 1*d.* a day for two years immediately preceding his claim, he would receive 2*d.* a day with two good conduct badges.”

Now, the following comparison, he said, would show what a different position the soldier who enlisted under this Act would be in, from what he had hitherto been in. He then compared the amount of money actually receivable by a soldier during 21 years under the provisions and regulations in force previous to the Royal Warrant of the 2nd June, 1870, exclusive of regimental pay and beer-money, which were as follows:—Regulations previous to 2nd June, 1870—bounty on joining, £1; bounty on re-engagement after 8 years, £1; extra penny a day on re-engagement after 8 years' service for 13 years, £19 15*s.* 5*d.*, exclusive of good conduct pay and pension on discharge—total £21 15*s.* 5*d.* On Warrant of 2nd June, 1870, up to 12 years, inclusive—bounty, nil; good conduct pay after the second year's service for 4 years, £6 1*s.* 8*d.*; which completed 6 years with the standards; total, £6 1*s.* 8*d.*—and which showed a decrease in receipt of £15 13*s.* 9*d.* But, in the event of a man serving the whole of the 12 years with the standards, or being, as a matter of course, allowed the option of re-engaging, he ought at the end of his service, provided his character was invariably good, to have received 2*d.* a day for the last six years of his enlistment, which would amount to £18 5*s.*, and a total of £24 6*s.* 8*d.*—a sum which many would never obtain, owing to the stringent rule as to regimental offence which, although prejudicial to them financially, ought not, as a matter of course, to stamp them as bad characters. Now, he considered this raised a question of serious importance, for under this new scheme a man might have served six years and never have received good conduct pay—a circumstance which would tell more against him as a first Army Reserve man, on making application for civil employment, than even a bad discharge would tell against a civilian who had been turned off by his employer, thereby considerably diminishing the soldier's chance of civil employment. Now, to show the difference between the old and the intended new system. On the existing system a soldier who had served 21 years received £21 15*s.* 5*d.* for bounty and re-engagement pay, and if he had been free from regimental offence he also received good conduct pay after 3, 8, and 13 years from 1*d.* to 3*d.* a day, to the amount of £59 6*s.* 3*d.*, and he also received a pension on discharge which at the lowest rate of 8*d.* a day, and supposing he lived to the moderate age of 60, would amount to £255 10*s.*, and to a sum total of £336 11*s.* 8*d.*, and he thought no one could say that the British soldier was overpaid, considering the price of labour and the service which he rendered to his country; whereas, on the new system about to be established, and backed up by the Warrant of the 2nd of June, the soldier could only have received a total of £24 6*s.* 8*d.* good conduct pay, up to 12 years' service—the maximum period of his enrolment—and that with the best of characters, and not a farthing more, because he was to be deprived of the option of continuing in the service, if he wished it, and thereby ensuring his livelihood as a soldier. But if he were to have the exclusive option of re-engaging continuously up to 21 years—that was for nine years more after his first enrolment had expired—and with the prospect of a pension on discharge, to which he would be fairly entitled, he would have received, for good conduct pay, £69 19s. 2d., and for pension, if he lived to 60, at 8d. a day, £225 10s., making a total of £325 9s. 2d. But as that was not the intention of the Bill or the Warrant, as far as the rank and file were concerned, the scale had no application after 12 years with the standards, and it was quite illusory. There was another important alteration contained in the Royal Warrant of the 2nd June, which decreed that the additional pay of 1d. a day granted by the Warrant of 29th June, 1867, should not be issued to any man who should re-engage more than three months after the date of receipt of the new Warrant in the district or command in which he should be serving; so that the conditions upon which all those men had been serving were to be abolished, and only three months' law given from the 2nd of June to qualify for re-engagement; so that if a man had served seven years and eight months, he would lose the 1d. a day, which his comrade, who had served one month more, would receive. That was clearly unjust. It was all very well to say that the men who were sent into the First Army Reserve would get 4d. a day; but that was merely the price of military bondage, in the shape of a retaining fee for future service if necessary. According to the provisions of the Bill and of the Royal Warrant, the Army would no longer be looked upon as an honourable profession or of prospective interest, because its compulsory short service would deprive it of its character as a profession. These considerations, he thought, would have the effect of deterring young men from enlisting; and, under all the circumstances, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would agree to postpone the further consideration of the Bill until its scope was more generally understood.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he thought that the Secretary of State for War must admit that the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Dover (Major Dickson) was conceived in an admirable spirit and expressed in moderate terms. Some nights ago, he (Viscount Bury) expressed the opinion that this was not a proper time to enter upon a very material and radical change in the constitution of our Army. Since then the state of things which he had in contemplation when he made that remark had arisen, and Europe was now in a state of war. It was all very well for hon. Gentlemen to say that England would throughout the struggle maintain her neutrality; but he must say that to anyone who studied the signs of the times the possibility of England being able to maintain strict neutrality during the whole of the war now commencing must appear as at least a matter of speculation. They had heard of announcements on the part of one Great Power and another that they would remain neutral so long as Prussia and France were alone engaged in the struggle; but they also learned from apparently authentic statements in the newspapers that if other events arose, and other Powers were drawn into the quarrel, Russia would not be content to look on and be neutral. They had also heard of a message addressed by France to Belgium for the purpose of ascertaining whether Belgium was prepared to defend her frontier against attack by Prussia, and of the spirited reply made by the King of the Belgians to the question addressed by France as to the defence of the frontier; but no one could fail to see that, regard being had to our treaty obligations with Belgium, we were in a position which, in a probable contingency, might cause our neutrality to be seriously imperilled. Under these circumstances, hon. Members felt themselves to a great extent tongue-tied, as a single heedless word might produce great difficulties, and, therefore, he repeated that it was not desirable that this House should be compelled to go into the discussion of various questions which the measure would involve. He yielded to no one in his admiration for the abilities of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, or in the recognition of the right hon. Gentleman's thorough mastery of the details of his Department; but he could not believe that this Short Enlistment Bill would be a good thing for the Army. Those who knew anything about the service were aware that it took three years to make a man an efficient soldier, and yet just at the expiration of that time it was now proposed to part with him. It was said that the man would be relegated to the Army of Reserve until he was wanted for future service; but there was good reason to believe that if the man found civil employment to suit him he would not return to the standards, or if he did come back, it would be as unwillingly as a conscript entered a Continental army. He agreed with the hon. Member for Abingdon (Colonel Lindsay), that the Bill might operate unjustly with regard to many soldiers, for if a man, however excellent he might be in all other respects, failed to observe all the strict regulations of military discipline, he would be debarred from obtaining civil employment. He would not go so far as the hon. and gallant Member for Dover; he did not find fault with the Bill root and branch; but he thought they ought to have a very full exposition of the reasons which induced the right hon. Gentleman to propose this great change. The introduction of the Royal Warrant to which allusion had been made had taken away the additional 1d. a-day on re-enlistment, and he disbelieved in their power to attract as many men as this system would require; for the Bill would have the effect of causing a compulsory retirement. He trusted his right hon. Friend would give good reasons for opposing the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Dover. At present he (Viscount Bury) saw no alternative but to support it.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he quite agreed that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Dover (Major Dickson) had introduced this subject in a tone and manner which entitled it to the favourable consideration of the Government and of the House. But he did not rise to enter into any discussion of the principle of the Bill. When his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell) brought forward this subject, in the speech in which he moved the Army Estimates, he, following him, stated that when he held the Office of Secretary of State for War he was frequently pressed by military authorities of very great weight to consider the question of diminishing the time of service in the Army, and he proceeded to state that he should be perfectly willing to give a fair consideration to the Bill to be introduced. That Bill was now before them; and if they proceeded with the Committee, he should have abundant opportunity of considering, as the different clauses came before them, what was the principle of the Bill, and how far it was likely to conduce to the improvement of the Army. He would rather address himself to what fell from his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Dover and his noble Friend (Viscount Bury) with regard to the moment when they were called on to discuss the Bill. Whatever might be the merits of the question of short service of the Army they must all be aware that it was one on which high military authorities were very much divided. Many thought short enlistment would be an improvement; others, entitled to the greatest weight, thought it dangerous; he must therefore appeal to his right hon. Friend, whether it would be prudent, at the present moment to embark on a change which certainly was not necessary. Our Army had always maintained the highest character. It was a fact that could not be disputed — the Army of England, for its numbers, had always been one of the most efficient in the world. He willingly admitted that was no reason why they should refrain from improvement where improvement could be effected. It was no reason why they should abstain from experimental changes; but he could not help hoping the Government would think that when war had so suddenly broken out, and when they knew not from day to day what events might arise, that was not a moment for commencing unnecessary experiments which might have a tendency to cause alarm and shake public confidence in our military system. He should reserve himself with regard to the clauses of the Bill till they came before them in regular order. He had no intention of dissuading the right hon. Gentleman from trying an experiment of this kind when, hereafter, a favourable moment presented itself; but he very much doubted whether the present was an opportunity that he could avail himself of.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I admit the justice of the appeal made to me by my right hon. Friend who preceded me in Office (Sir John Pakington). I admit also that the Motion was made in the most friendly terms, and that every proposal I have made since I came into Office has been considered by him with the most perfect candour and fairness. Still, I must say that this is not a right Motion. In the first place, it is brought forward without Notice, and if Notice had been given that we were going to discuss the principle of the Bill on the present occasion, I think there would probably have been a much larger attendance of hon. Members. In consequence of the pressure of other business at the time of the second reading, I only gave a short explanation of the object of the measure, and I do not think the Committee fully appreciate what the Bill is. It has been spoken of as a revolutionary change in the system of the Army, but, in point of fact, it is not a revolutionary change at all. Indeed, I should be the last man to propose a revolutionary change in a system so complicated as that of the British Army. Again, it has been stated that I am necessarily a mere theorist because I have no practical acquaintance with military matters. I may remark, however, that I have the means of obtaining the best military information, and, certainly, I have not proceeded with this Bill without getting all the information I could. If you pass this Bill you will not take away from the Government or from the military authorities one single power they now possess, nor will you strike a blow at the present system of recruiting for the Army. Let this be distinctly understood. You are invited to give them additional power, and to enable them to attract to the standards a class of men who will not now join them. Then, as to the time, I must say that if there could be one moment more opportune than another for making the experiment it would be a time of emergency. The Bill, however, was introduced at the beginning of the Session, and I introduced it then because I thought it would work beneficially for the Army and for the whole community; for everything that tends to make the Army more popular, and to create a good feeling between it and the community at large cannot fail to be beneficial to both. No time would be better for trying such an experiment as the present, when additional powers for recruiting may possibly be wanted. It has been said that short-time men would be less valuable than those enlisted for a longer period. But what possible effect can short enlistment have upon the Army in the case of men who are to be the subjects of this Act of Parliament? It may bring you, and I hope it will, an additional number of men willing to join your standards, but the period when they leave the standards will be six years hence. They cannot possibly affect you by withdrawing, because this will not happen until six years hence. With respect to the three years' term, I have repeatedly stated that that was the minimum; my object is to place the men for six years in the Army, and for another six years in the Reserve. Then we have heard a great deal about old soldiers. No man has said more than I have in favour of old soldiers. I have quoted the remarkable words of the Duke of Wellington, but what did the Duke say? Did he say they were to be all old soldiers? On the contrary, what he said was that the old soldier was to be the hinge and pivot of the Army, and that when you had a certain number of old soldiers in the Army it was wonderful what the young men would do side by side with them. The object of the Bill is, that while you maintain intact all the power of recruiting that you possess, and while you do not weaken the Army one iota or impair its efficiency, you introduce an entirely new element which we hope will be most efficacious. Now, I trust I shall not lose the vote of any hon. Member at this time who would have been ready to support it at another. If this were a hazardous experiment, I should be unwilling to try it at any time; I, however, believe it to be an experiment which will add greatly to the power of those engaged in recruiting the Army. Other countries have conscription and less of foreign service, and do not have to contend with our high rate of wages in civil employment. We have no conscription. God forbid that we ever should! We have a very extensive foreign service and the highest rate of wages of any country in Europe, and that places great difficulties in our way. We wish to avail ourselves of the willing services of every man whom we can induce to join. It has been said that you will get only unwilling men, who, when they get into the Reserve, will not return to the standards. But does not the noble Lord (Viscount Bury), who uses that argument, perceive that if the argument has any force it must have far greater force in the case of a man who is invited to join the Army for a long period? How many men will say—"I will join the Army for six years, with the prospect of a regular yearly allowance for six years more," who would not join for 12 years' continual service; and how many men in times when the military spirit is excited would enlist for the shorter period who could not bring themselves to think of the longer? This provision will be adding considerably to the power of those who have to call for troops for the Army. I need not enter into the questions which have been raised about the long period of service; I have explained that this is not a Bill for the three years' service, but for six years. I shall, however, be able to show, when I come to the clause, that it would be more convenient to make a minimum of three years in certain cases than to limit the authorities to six years. Considering the obstacles which I have mentioned as being in the way of enlistment in this country, it is desirable that Parliament should interpose no other obstacles, but should make the system as elastic as possible. We wish the service to offer attractions to men of every disposition as regards time. An hon. Member (Mr. O'Reilly) has spoken of this Bill as if it were designed to enlist men for 12 years, and in discussing the Royal Warrant, which I think he cannot clearly comprehend, he spoke as if the Bill were intended to limit enlistment for 12 years. It is no such thing. This Bill contemplates that if a man is enlisted for six years it shall be possible for him to agree to go on for 12, and, after that, for nine more, making 21 years, and even beyond that if he should have become a valuable non-commissioned officer. In short, the general principle of the Bill is not to try experiments with those things which exist, but to add to what we now have increased powers. I trust the hon. Member (Major Dickson) will, under these circumstances, allow me to proceed and not press a Motion which I fully admit was justified by the haste with which the Bill was read a second time.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, that the Bill was evidently based upon a fallacy which seemed to have taken strong hold of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell), and that was that by merely reducing the number of years a better class of men would be induced to join. But when the present high rate of wages among labourers was taken into account it would be seen that it was absurd to suppose 1s. 2d. per day would obtain a better class of men for six years than 1s. 2d. per day did now. Six years' enlistment at 1s. 2d. per day would not draw men earning 16s. and 18s. a-week on railways or under commercial firms. His objections to the Bill, however, were expressed in an Amendment he had placed on the Paper, and he supported the Motion of his hon. Friend (Major Dickson), in the hope that the Government would be induced to withdraw the Bill in order that it might be amended in many respects. He was not opposed to a great part of the Bill; he was anxious for an Army of Reserve, but was at issue with his right hon. Friend as to the means by which it should be obtained. He would enlist for 12 years, as at present, but give power in the Bill to discharge any man at any time within the period without being obliged to give a reason for dismissal. Those men who were discharged at the end of six or seven years, as was most convenient, could be invited to join the Army of Reserve with 4d. per day pay. If a man declined, a recruit would fill his place; and the result would be that a number of men having had the advantage of six years' training would be scattered about the country. He was afraid that the provisions of this Bill would not be fully understood by the recruits, and that at the expiration of the six years' service they would think that they had been entrapped into serving in the Army Reserve. He was glad that the right hon. Gentlemen had conceded so much as to lengthen the period of enlistment from three years to six. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) unintentionally fell into an error when he stated that at the present moment the French soldiers were enlisted for the term of the war, which was not likely to be as long as three years. The real fact was, that French soldiers who had served their time were re-enlisted for three years or for the term of the war. An allusion had been made to an observation of the Duke of Wellington respecting the troops at Waterloo. Now, a relative of his had met the Duke at dinner in the company of Canning, who questioned him very much upon the Battle of Waterloo and his other principal battles, and more particularly with regard to what he would have done had he had his old Peninsular soldiers with him at the former battle, and the Duke's reply was, that in that case the battle would not have lasted six hours, but that then it would not have been the Battle of Waterloo, and that it would not have had the decisive effect it had. The Duke's opinion of the Army at Waterloo was that it was the worst that he had ever commanded, it being chiefly composed of young untrained recruits, a large number of whom wore their militia uniform.

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT said, he was cordially in favour of the principle of the Bill as far as it proposed to shorten the period of enlistment and to popularize the Army. He must, however, on Clause 4, move to amend the measure by leaving out in page 1, line 25, the words, "Army service," and substituting therefor the words, "the infantry or five years in the cavalry, seven in the artillery, and ten in the engineers." The object of the Bill was to leave the number of cadres of regiments untouched and to give the Secretary of State for War the means of filling them up when necessary with a number of trained men. The question before the country was, whether they would prefer to be defended by a small number of perfectly trained men, or by a still smaller number of perfectly trained men and a large number of those who were in a manner leavened with military training. He thought three years was quite sufficient time to make a substantially good infantry soldier—that was, at least four-fifths of the soldier's education would be acquired in that time. The American soldiers in two years and a-half were transformed from the raw recruits who captured Fort Sumter without losing a drop of blood—except in the case of two men, who were killed by the fireworks celebrating the event—into the disciplined veterans who poured out whole holocausts of blood at Gettysburg. It was said by military critics that the chief cause of the success of the Prussian forces was that they were formed under the principle embodied in this Bill, which would be tested in the approaching campaign. The French system was rather the other way. He thought it would be well if the whole of our Reserves were made to pass through the Army, which would afford them the best military training school possible.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, with respect to the observation of the Duke of Wellington, to which he had made an allusion, the accuracy of which had been impugned by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Mr. O'Reilly), he had referred to the Letters of Sir George C. Lewis in the Library, and had found therein this statement—

"I have often heard my father quote a remark of the Duke of Wellington, that if he had had his Peninsular regiments at Waterloo the battle would not have lasted till two o'clock. I think he said this to my father or in his presence."

COLONEL NORTH said, he regretted to hear from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cardwell) that he was about to part with the powers of enlistment he had hitherto possessed.

MR. CARDWELL: What I intended to state, was that every power of enlistment that we had under the old system would remain. There is nothing in the Bill which repeals one of those powers. All that the measure proposes to do is to give us additional powers.

COLONEL NORTH said, he had looked in vain for the word "pension" in the Bill.

MR. CARDWELL: That is because it does not repeal any part of the old law which gives pensions.

COLONEL NORTH said, he was anxious to know what, under the circumstances, would be the position of recruits under the new law with respect to pensions. Of course, they could not break faith with those who enlisted before it was passed. He wanted to know whether those who enlisted under the new Bill would be entitled to pensions? [MR. CARDWELL: Certainly.] He was for seeing in our Army the professional soldier—the man who made a military life his calling, and who followed the fortunes of his regiment wherever it might go. It was admitted that it took three years to make a soldier. Why, then, were we to get rid of him the moment he was made? Everyone knew that the country was put to a great expense before the recruit was of the slightest use. It was to the esprit which long association with a regiment gave men that their officers had to trust in the hour of the greatest danger, and it was it which carried regiments through almost impossible difficulties. His right hon. Friend the Secretary for War had alluded to the strength of foreign armies. The power of those armies afforded an argument against reducing the strength of our Army, and yet we had dismissed no fewer than 20,000 men from it within the last 15 months. In "another place" the Under Secretary for War had stated that there were 61 regiments at home now, whereas there had been only 46 at home in 1868. There was this, however, to be said on the other side, that in the 46 regiments of 1868 there were some 13,100 more men than in the 61 regiments of the present day, because there were 950 in each battalion at home in 1868, while there were only 500 in each battalion at home now. [Mr. CARDWELL: No!] He contended he was right in his estimate. It had been already stated in debate that nine regiments at Aldershot last week produced less than 3,000 men; and some months ago he stated that out of a battalion of 500 men 150 had to be deducted for orderlies, sick, officers' servants, band, &c., and that at a time, when they did not know where to turn for men. In 1854, at the time of the breaking out of the Crimean War, the strength of the Army was 124,801 men. There were serving in the ranks 122,464, leaving a deficit of 2,337 men. The following year they were increased to 189,956, but only 143,298 were serving in the field, leaving a deficit of 46,658. In 1856 the Army was increased to 205,808, and there were serving in the ranks 155,406, men, leaving a deficit of 50,402 men. He would trouble the House with an extract from the Report of the Recruiting Commission of 1867, which was presided over by the Earl of Dalhousie. It was in these terms—

"Recent events, however, have taught us that we must not rely in future on having time for preparation. Wars will be sudden in their commencement and short in their duration, and woe to that country which is unprepared to defend itself against any contingency that may arise, or combination which may be formed against it."

In conclusion, the Commissioners stated—

"Having thus given our opinion on the different points referred to us, in conclusion we must observe that we are perfectly aware that our suggestions, if acted upon will tend to increase the cost of the Army. But, when we consider the vast interests at stake, and the immense amount of wealth and property accumulated throughout the country as well as in our large cities, we cannot believe that the nation will hesitate in paying what, after all, will amount to a very trifling rate of insurance; and by maintaining the peace establishment of the Army in a sound and satisfactory condition, and having in its support a well disciplined Reserve, we may thus arrive at a military organization such as shall give confidence to the country, and enable all your Majesty's subjects to prosecute without distraction those duties and pursuits in which they may be engaged."

He would now direct the attention of the Committee to some remarks made by a man whose opinion carried weight with that House, and whose loss to the House and the country they all deplored. He meant Lord Herbert of Lea. In a speech delivered by him in the House of Commons on the 12th of December, 1854, Mr. Sidney Herbert used this language—

"But, I ask, on whom rests the responsibility that England, at the commencement of a war, must make small wars? Why is it? It has been the fault of every Parliament; we have always had the same stereotyped system of economy in military affairs. I am speaking the whole plain truth in this matter. I am as much to blame as any one. I have held for some years the responsible situation of Secretary of War, and I know what have been my own shortcomings in this respect; but this too I know, that whenever I have brought forward, as I have done, what are called Peace Estimates, I have constantly been met with Motions for large reductions. I say, therefore, that it has been the fault of all parties, all Administrations, every Parliament; I am afraid I cannot give my assent to any exception, however eager I may be to do so; I have seen Administrations formed of various parties—I have seen them taking different courses on almost every conceivable subject, but on one they have agreed, and that has been the one to which I have alluded—one of improvident economy. What has been the result? At the commencement of the war we had to make means, and to create an Army and to use it at the same time."—[8 Hansard, cxxxvi. 186.]

Again—

"We could not get a man of those regiments which the right hon. Baronet says ought to have been sent out; and he must recollect that we cannot create an Army; we must get the men first, then make them into soldiers by drilling them and instructing them in the skilful use of their weapon; for nothing will be so injurious to the reputation of our Army as sending men into the field inefficient for their duty."—[Ibid 152.]

What would be our position if we were dragged into the war just commenced? This country was always ungrateful to its public men in times of trouble, and the first victim of their ingratitude would be his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. Could anything have been more atrocious than the conduct pursued towards the late Duke of Newcastle at the time of the difficulties in the Crimea? He was made responsible for everything that had occurred, though, as shown by Lord Herbert, it was owing to the penurious course taken during successive years by the House of Commons. You might drill a man in three months, but it was the disciplined mind that made the soldier a man who could not only judge for himself, but obey the order of his commander. In Hyde Park the Volunteers moved with great precision; but they had never done outpost duty or mounted guard. He hoped the House and the country would recognize the necessity of maintaining an Army of trained soldiers.

MR. CARDWELL said, he would not follow his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel North) into the discussion of topics which he thought hardly germane to the matter in hand. [Colonel North said the subject was recruiting.] The more the country stood in need of recruits the greater the urgency for passing this Bill; but he wished to say that the distribution of troops, under the Estimates of the present year, gave a larger number of regular troops in this country than the distribution of 1868. When the regiments coming, and already on their way, from the Colonies arrived home there would be a larger force in this country than we had in 1868; and taking into account our Reserves available for home and foreign service, there would be a larger force available for active service than there had been in any year since 1816, except the year succeeding the last year of the Crimean War.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that it was quite right the country should know what our available force amounted to in case of any unforeseen contingency arising. According to the disposition of troops given in the Army List for July, we had at home 37 battalions of the Line, and six of the Guards, and three regiments of Cavalry; and taking the strength of the battalions of the Line at 400, that of the battalions of the Guards at 600, and that of the Cavalry regiments at 250, we had about 18,400 men of the Line and the Guards, and 3,500 Cavalry for garrison and field duty at home in case of invasion.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Twelve years the limit of enlistment).

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he had given Notice of an Amendment—namely, in page 1, line 14, after “service,” to insert, “Provided always, That no person shall be enlisted as a soldier until he has attained the age of twenty.” We had suffered very much, indeed, from having young soldiers in our ranks, and as this was a Bill really limiting the term for the enlistment of the soldier, it was right to provide that the State should have the advantage of his services in the prime of youth. The result of enlisting mere boys and sending them out for service during the Crimean War was that they filled the hospitals and cost the country much money. Again, much of the success of Prussia in 1866 was due to the fact of her soldiers being older than those of Austria. It might be said that his Amendment would limit our choice of men in case of emergency. To a certain extent it would do so; but it was a question whether it would not be far better, as a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence, to pay a large bounty and so secure a man of more mature age than to enlist a mere boy, who simply sickened in the service and became a burden on the country. Another reason in favour of his Amendment was that the Militia and the Line now entered into competition with each other, the age for enlistment in both branches of the service being the same. His view was that the Militia was the real Reserve Force of the country, and it would be far better if young men enlisted in it at 18 or 19, and that afterwards they should be drafted, if necessary, into the Line. If the Secretary of State for War would give him an assurance that he would take care that no soldier should leave this country before he was 20 years of age, he would not press the Amendment which he now proposed.

MR. CARDWELL said, the object of the Bill was to set men at liberty for civil life at an early period, and it would be quite inconsistent with that object to enact that no recruit should be enlisted under the age of 20. The limitation proposed by the noble Lord was not supported either by the opinion of military authorities or by the Report of the Recruiting Commission. If they adopted the age of 20, they would be obliged to take as recruits young men who had tried some other employment and had failed, or, perhaps, lost their character. As to sending recruits on service abroad, no doubt it was desirable that they should not go to India, for example, too young; and by the working of the double battalion system it was sought to obviate that evil as far as possible. He could not, however, engage to limit the power of recruiting in the way suggested by the noble Lord.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he hoped that the noble Lord (Lord Eustace Cecil) would not press his Amendment to a Division. Having, unfortunately, in this country no conscription, we were not able to take our men when we chose, but rather when we could get them. A large number of men entered at 18 years; and, indeed, it was remarkable how frequently the age of 17 years and nine months occurred, 18 being the time from which service for pensions dated. If the limit were raised to 20 years the only difference would be that it would lead to a little harder swearing.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he had an Amendment to propose—namely, in line 19, to leave out from “and for the residue” to the end of the clause. He desired to give the Secretary of State for War every facility for forming his Army of Reserve, if he would form it, in the way that was not likely to create suspicion among the young men who entered the service. If the right hon. Gentleman would enlist them for 12 years, reserving to himself the right to discharge them after any period of service, they would perfectly understand it. But many of them being uneducated, or but slightly educated, if asked to enlist for 12 years, six years to be passed in the Army of Service and six years in the Army of Reserve, he was afraid that many a man who was turned out at the end of six years’ service, with no choice in the matter, would think he had been entrapped into a second engagement, and thus a feeling of dissatisfaction would be excited.

Mr. CARDWELL said, the Amendment really struck at the root of the whole Bill. He did not think the recruit was an ignoramus who could not make an intelligent bargain, and the object of the Government was to get men who were quite capable of understanding the contract into which they entered. It used to be the notion that they could not trust a recruit without an escort, but now they gave him a railway ticket and told him to go to his regiment; and last year out of 8,182 men only seven acted in a manner not to justify this confidence. The great inducement these men would have to join our standards was the engagement that at the end of six years’ service they would have 4*d.* per day to pay their rent or meet any other expense to which they were put.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he hoped his right hon. and gallant Friend would not press his Motion to a Division.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Change of service).

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he considered this the most important clause in the Bill. It gave power to the Secretary of State to discharge soldiers at the end of three years’ service. That would be just when they were becoming of service. The right hon. Gentleman thought by this Bill to improve the Army from the better class of recruits he would obtain. He (Colonel Barttelot) believed that was a great mistake. The men enlisted for three years would come in as amateurs, whose object would be to retire as soon as possible into private life; and when in private life and married, and with good and remunerative situations, how could it be expected that they could be got at any time they were required? He was expressing the opinion of most commanding officers, and he would venture to say that the opinion of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief was opposed to that of the right hon. Gentleman on this matter. They wanted men who would take up the Army as a profession; but the Bill would bring into the Army a lot of young men who would afterwards return to private life, and who, from their short service, would have no attachment for their regiment, and who, if again called upon to serve, would have no knowledge of, and consequently no confidence in, their officers. The right hon. Gentleman might have shoals of recruits; but what would be the condition of their regiments? They would not have the same class of fighting men they now had. He wanted to have some definite time named, and that the Secretary of State should not have the power to enlist men for the Army as he pleased for three or six years. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, and to state that he should divide the Committee on this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 24, to leave out the word "three," in order to insert the word "five."—(Colonel Barttelot.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he very much doubted the prudence of retaining the term "three." He understood his right hon. Friend intended practically to extend the period of enlistment to six years. [Mr. CARDWELL: Generally.] Then he had great confidence in the good old rule—"Always say what you mean and mean what you say." If his right hon. Friend meant "six," why did he say "three?" It was this clause which led him (Sir John Pakington) to think it would be more prudent in the present state of Europe if the Bill were not pressed.

MR. CARDWELL said, he would explain the motive of this clause. It was not a clause which enabled the Secretary of State for War to enlist or engage. That power was given by the 3rd clause. The clause they were now considering simply enabled a variation to be made by mutual consent in the terms of engagement. He proposed to put in the clause the minimum of three years, but that was not at all inconsistent with the general intention of making the service six years—it might be inconvenient to take all recruits for six years. If a regiment were going to India, for instance, in four or five years it might be extremely convenient to recruit it for the short period of three years and afterwards a second time with special reference to India; or, to take another case, suppose, after a war, as at the end of the Crimean War, there was a great call for the reduction of Estimates, and it became necessary to reduce the Army—if a great number of men were suddenly discharged, they would retire under a sense of injustice and hardship at being dismissed after they had given their best services during the war. This clause would give the opportunity of offering to all who chose to accept the pay and advantages of the Reserve.

COLONEL NORTH said, he thought there could not be a great objection to our young recruits going out to India for the full term of their service, because it was proved that that class of men were far more likely to live in India than men of a more advanced age.

CAPTAIN STANLEY said, he must oppose the clause. He submitted whether the second paragraph in the 7th clause did not cover any doubts as to regiments going to India, and, therefore, whether it was not possible that the first service at least should be of a definite duration.

MR. CARDWELL said, it was quite possible that the transfer of men to home regiments might make those regiments in excess of the establishment strength.

CAPTAIN STANLEY said, he would ask whether that difficulty was not met by any provision giving the Secretary of State power to transfer from regiments which were in excess to regiments which were not? He was of opinion that there would be much dissatisfaction amongst the men, if, having enlisted for a certain period, they were sent to the Reserve before the expiration of such period.

MR. CARDWELL said, it might be very much better for the public service to transfer the men to the Reserve rather than to regiments. He was anxious, by recruiting new men, to keep up the regimental spirit.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he thought it right that the men should thoroughly understand everything that appeared on the face of their enlistment. If they were shown an Act of Parliament which said that at the end of three years they were to be dismissed, but it was really intended that that should not be done till they had served six years, it would be better to say at once that the service should be for six years. The more he saw of the Bill, and the more he heard his right hon. Friend's (Mr. Cardwell's) explanation, the more he was convinced that the period stated in the Bill was all the time for which they could retain the services of these men. If a man was to enlist at nineteen, to remain in the ranks for six years, and if he was then sent into the Reserve, he would go into business, take a shop, and marry, and they could not without hardship bring him back again. He had married a wife, and so he would not come. They might as well make him a present of the 4d. a day, for they never could get him back.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, the soldier would enlist for 12 years, and the recruiting officer would tell him how many

he was to serve under the standard, and that at the end of the period of four, five, or six years, as it might be, he would go into the Reserve. If hon. Gentlemen would be good enough to read the second paragraph of the 3rd clause, they would find that the portion of the period for which he was to serve under the standards was to be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of State, and specified in the attestation paper, so that there could be no doubt on the recruit's mind as to the terms of the service. His noble Friend (Viscount Bury) had said that the man would open a shop and marry, and could not be got back. But the Reserve soldier would be liable to the same provisions as the pensioner—he would have to attend drill, and show himself at certain times to the military authorities in order to claim his 4d. a day; besides which if he did not attend he would be tried for desertion.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to know whether the recruit would be able to read in the attestation paper that if he did not come up again he would be tried for desertion.

MAJOR ANSON said, he had intended to vote for the clause until he heard the speeches in support of it; but he would now vote for the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Barttelot). He had much experience of India, and he believed that nothing would be more fatal to our power in that country than to send out young recruits there in the way now proposed.

MR. CARDWELL said, the Bill gave power to the Secretary of State to apportion the recruits to the Indian regiments in such a way that the regiments should not contain too many young soldiers.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, it appeared that the position that a boon was offered to the recruit was abandoned, for the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) trusted rather to the policeman. He was afraid if the action of the policeman was invoked, it would make these men anti-recruiting agents for the rest of their lives.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would ask what objection any man could have to getting 4d. a day for really doing nothing, unless under certain circumstances which they all hoped would not occur—except to show himself and to parade at certain periods?

Captain Vivian

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he thought it quite certain, if the right hon. Gentleman was confident the recruit would think this a boon, he would not require him to accept it six years in advance.

MR. CARDWELL said, the universal presumption of every contract was that it was for the benefit of both parties to it. But he had never heard before that there should be no laws for the enforcement of the contract.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, that the recruit was very much like the Irish tenant; he was not a fit person to contract. When a man had been a year or two in the service he knew how to look after his own interests; but it was not fair to enlist him with all the pains and penalties attached without putting it into his attestation paper. The hon. Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) had proved that this provision would not only do a great deal of harm to the Army, but would take in the recruit, who would be subject to such regulations as might be made from time to time by the Secretary of State. He was quite sure the present Secretary of State would do nothing unfair; but future Secretaries of State might think it necessary to reduce the Army in a hurry, and thus get rid of all the engagements they might have entered into.

MAJOR DICKSON said, he regarded the Bill as likely to ruin our prestige in India.

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY said, he thought the terms upon which the soldier was to be enlisted should be clearly understood. It would be much more simple to put in six years at once. A Bill could not be very clear or simple which required so many explanations from two Members of the Government.

MR. EASTWICK said, he would remark that this short service would entail additional expense.

Question put, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—

The Tellers being come to the Table, Colonel Barttelot, one of the Tellers for the Noes, stated that Mr. Matthews, the Member for Dungarvan, had not voted.

Whereupon the Chairman directed the honourable Member for Dungarvan to come to the Table, and asked him if he had heard the Question put; and the honourable Member having stated that he had heard the Question put, and declared himself with the Noes, the Chairman desired his vote to be added to the Noes.

The Tellers accordingly declared the Numbers, Ayes 122; Noes 56: Majority 66.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he would beg leave to move, in page 1, line 25, to leave out "Army service" and insert "the infantry, or five years in the cavalry, artillery, and engineers." He should like to have some assurance as regarded those three branches of the service, because if the large numbers of men who were engaged in them were liable to be sent home after the expiration of three years, it would be a perfect farce. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) would state distinctly that he did not intend to touch those branches.

Amendment proposed, in line 25, to leave out the words "Army service," in order to insert the words "the infantry, or five years in the cavalry, artillery, and engineers."—(Colonel Barttelot.)

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT said, he had on the Paper another Amendment, to leave out "Army service" and insert "the infantry, or five years in the cavalry, seven in the artillery, and ten in the engineers." He would state the duties of those branches in order to show that if the term of three years was right as regarded the infantry it must be wrong with respect to the others.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out that there was already an Amendment before the Committee.

MR. CARDWELL said, he hoped that the hon. and gallant Member for Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) would not press his Amendment.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he was exceedingly sorry the right hon. Gentleman had not thought fit to give way on the point. He believed the Amendment to be a sound and honest one, and he should certainly persist in it.

MAJOR DICKSON said, he wished to know whether the opinion of any cavalry officer had been taken on the subject.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said he might mention the case of the 11th Regiment, which had served under the late Lord Cardigan, which had practically to be remounted after its return from India, and which yet at the end of 12 months was reported fit for duty.

MR. NOEL said, he had often heard Lord Cardigan say that it required three years to make a cavalry soldier, but that he preferred five.

MAJOR ANSON said, he had heard Lord Clyde, speaking of the 9th Lancers, as it filed past him, say that people had abused him for not risking his soldiers; but if he had allowed that regiment to be cut up it would have taken seven years before it could be replaced. In that opinion he concurred, and he should therefore support the Amendment.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he believed that all the commanding officers of cavalry but one were in favour of his proposal.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) had mentioned, in support of his view, the name of an officer who was not alive, and who could not contradict the statement which he had made.

Question put, "That the words 'Army service' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 85: Majority 26.

COLONEL NORTH said, he must quote the opinion of a predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sidney Herbert), who, in 1856, said—

"The efficiency of the Army is at stake, and in any change such as I have to make, we ought to be careful to have the assent of the great body of the profession."

Now there was hardly one military man who agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in this most suicidal proposal.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (In imminent national danger, Her Majesty may continue soldiers in Army service).

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he would suggest that every soldier on discharge should be able to go away with a little money in his pocket, and with this view the right hon. Gentleman might arrange to give the men a small gratuity.

MR. CARDWELL said, that suggestion should be considered.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Enlistment for general service).

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, this clause would strike a deadly blow at our regimental system, which had never yet failed.

MR. CARDWELL said, the enlistment would first be for general service, and the military authorities would afterwards be empowered to post the recruit to a particular regiment. The principle existed already under the 10th section of the present Army Enlistment Act, and the Recruiting Commission were of opinion that as many men as possible should be recruited for general service. In a subsequent clause, however, he allowed men to be recruited for particular regiments.

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY said, the Bill entirely ignored the regimental system, and men thus recruited would have little interest in the service.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 and 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (Re-engagement of soldiers).

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he would propose to insert in line 3, after "any soldier," the words "not under the rank of full corporal." This limitation would enable the Secretary of State to relieve the country from a great part of the heavy burden in respect of pensions to discharged soldiers, which now amounted to £1,200,000. He did not propose to affect men who had been wounded, or re-engaged men after 12 years' service in the time of war.

MR. CARDWELL said, he thought the restriction proposed would be too severe.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

GUN LICENCES BILL—[BILL 134.]

(Mr. Dodson; Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stansfeld.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 23rd June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 7 (Penalty for using or carrying gun without licence).

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, with a view to prevent any check being placed on the rifle practice by Volunteers, he would propose as an Amendment in page 2, line 29, after the word "duty," to insert, "or when engaged in target practice."

Colonel Barttelot

MR. STANSFELD said, he would propose, on behalf of the Government, that the Committee should allow the Bill to pass through Committee as it stood at present, after accepting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Southampton (Mr. Russell Gurney), and then on the Report to take the Amendments placed on the Paper in the most convenient order. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) were carried, he should propose that the servants of an occupier of land having a licence should be exempt from the licence duty. If the Committee allowed the Bill to pass through Committee that night he would be prepared to bring up certain Amendments on the Report.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was very satisfactory. He would suggest that the Bill should be amended on the Report, by authorizing the owner of land, or the watcher employed by him, to demand the production of the licence.

MR. COLLINS said, he wished to point out the difficulty of discussing Amendments which were not in print. As far as he could see, the Amendments indicated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) would meet the approval of the majority of the House.

Amendment agreed to.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL—[BILL 15.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stansfeld.)

ORDER FOR SECOND READING DISCHARGED.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of this Bill be read and discharged.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was glad to hear that the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of this Bill was to be read and discharged; but he felt bound to remark that this was a Bill which proposed to affect the savings, amounting to £37,000,000, of 1,500,000 depositors, and that the effect of introducing a measure of this kind last year and during the present year had been to cause distrust among persons who were accustomed to deposit their money in savings banks. Many persons had withdrawn money who would otherwise have kept it in the banks, and many persons who would have deposited money had been deterred from placing it in the banks after what had occurred. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that in the course of the year there had been a loss of £125,000 in the amount of interest payable to the depositors, and this loss would fall upon the public. He thought it ought to go forth to the public that the depositors would receive every farthing of their deposits, and that the loss would not in any way fall upon them further than that in future the rate of interest payable to them would be reduced. If the matter were inquired into he should be able to show that this deficiency was occasioned, first, by the action of the Government, and secondly, by what had happened years ago, for which the present depositors should not suffer. He trusted next year that the right hon. Gentleman would not bring forward a Bill of this sort in the first week of the Session only to withdraw it towards its close. He trusted that a Committee would be appointed to inquire into the cause of the deficiency, and whether that deficiency could not be met by any other way than by reducing the amount of the interest.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not detain the House with any lengthened statement upon this subject. As he had already stated the public had lost £5,000,000 by the savings banks; they were still losing at the rate of £100,000 per annum, and the object of the Bill was to stop that loss by reducing the rate of interest.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [July 15] reported.

MR. STANSFELD explained that when the House was in Committee of Supply the other night, some Votes were taken for higher amounts than had been intended, owing to certain amended Resolutions not having been placed in the Chairman's hand. Those amended Resolutions were rendered necessary in consequence of Votes having been taken on account.

SHERIFFS (SCOTLAND) ACT (1853)

AMENDMENT, &c. BILL.—[Bill 191.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Adam)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. GORDON said, he wished to call attention to some of the provisions of this Bill—which, he might remark, was not printed and circulated till the 10th of July, and there had consequently been very little time to consider its provisions, which affected the interests of numerous localities in Scotland. The object of the Bill was to unite certain sheriffdoms in Scotland. That object received the approval of the Judicature Commissioners appointed in 1868. So far as this Bill dealt with the sheriffdoms he agreed to its necessity; but the Bill further proceeded to deal with certain questions connected with sheriffs-substitute and sheriff-clerks. He thought they were not at that moment in a position to deal with these latter questions; and in fact he thought it would be necessary to introduce a Bill next Session for the purpose of regulating various matters connected with those officials. He thought, therefore, that these clauses had much better be postponed until they could deal with the whole question as to the forms of procedure and the officers connected with the Sheriff Courts.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, it had become most important for the Government to consider how the number of sheriffs-principal and substitute might be diminished with advantage to the public service. There were certain vacancies which required to be filled up at once; but with regard to the question of sheriffs-substitute he agreed with the right hon. and learned Member (Mr. Gordon) as to the propriety of that question, which was the more important of the two, being dealt with in another Session. He thought the general question was of too great magnitude to be dealt with at that period of the Session. He quite agreed that the question should be postponed until the Report of the Commission on Scotch Judicature had been made.

MR. DYCE NICOL said, that this Bill had been kept hanging over them for three months, causing great alarm and agitation; and now that it had been presented they had had only a few days allowed for consideration; and the Report of the Commission on Scotch Law had not yet been made. This had given great offence in Scotland. He hoped the Government would consent to confine legislation to the union of the sheriffships, as to which there was almost universal agreement.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he did not concur in the sentiments of alarm of his hon. Friend. A Bill of this kind was absolutely necessary, and this Bill was conceived in a spirit of great boldness. In regard to sheriffs in Scotland many reforms were absolutely required; and this Bill dealt with some of those reforms in a bold and statesman-like spirit. The provisions objected to were absolutely necessary. If they were to have an alteration in the sheriffs' jurisdiction, they must, of course, also have an alteration in the jurisdiction of the sheriff-substitute.

MR. MILLER said, the only objection he had to the Bill was that it did not go quite far enough; but, as he understood, it would carry out almost to their full extent the recommendations of the Law Commissioners.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 struck out.

Clauses 2 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (County of Linlithgow to be united with the county of Mid-Lothian, and the counties of Clackmannan and Kinross to be united with the county of Fife).

MR. GORDON said, he had some Amendments to propose to this clause, the general object of which was that certain counties should be united in accordance with the recommendations of the Scotch Law Commissioners. By the first four clauses certain counties were to be united according to their suggestion; but when they came to Clause 5, a different rule applied with regard to Fife, and instead of providing that there should be a separation of the counties of Linlithgow, Clackmannan, and Kinross, as was recommended by the Commissioners, it provided that whenever a vacancy occurred in the office of the sheriff of Linlithgow, Clackmannan, and Kinross, the said counties should be disunited, and Linlithgow added to Mid-Lothian, and Clackmannan and Kinross united to Fife. The object of his Amendment was that Fife should be united to Clackmannan and Kinross, and that Linlithgow should be added to Mid-Lothian. The object of the Commissioners was to save the salary of any sheriffship which should become vacant, which was to be united to another; and that his Amendment proposed to effect. There was no reason that he could see why these counties should be dealt with on a different principle from others.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the union of the counties proposed by the Bill was based upon the recommendation of the Judicature Commission. Their Report was only presented on the 14th of the present month; but having been a member of the Commission, he had an opportunity of knowing what their Report would be, and he had accordingly prepared this Bill in order to put their recommendations in force as soon as possible. In the unions proposed, the Bill did not follow the recommendations of the Commissioners in all respects, but it substantially followed them: it differed in only two particulars. In the first place, the Commissioners recommended that the existing sheriffships of the counties of Banff and Elgin should remain undisturbed; whereas, by a clause in the Bill, it was proposed that a vacancy occurring in either county, the county of Banff and Kincardine should be annexed to the county of Aberdeen. The other variance was in regard to the counties of Clackmannan and Kinross. The Commissioners recommended that Clackmannan should be united with the county of Fife—a recommendation which was not favourably received by those most interested, and he had accordingly substituted the union proposed in the Bill. However, since the Bill had been introduced, there had been a strong expression of opinion on the part of the inhabitants of Clackmannan in favour of a union with Stirling in preference to a union with Fife. He was disposed to concur in the reasonableness of their desires, and he had accordingly prepared Amendments to effect a union between Clackmannan and Stirling instead of a union with Fife. With regard to the present Amendment, the substance of his right hon. and learned Friend's complaint was that the Government had not appointed to the sheriffship of Fife the gentleman who now held the office of Sheriff of Clackmannan and Kinross. He did not intend to make the slightest reflection on that learned gentleman; but it was one thing to appoint a sheriff to a larger county, and to put under his jurisdiction a smaller county, and another to appoint a man to a small county, and then place a larger under his authority. He did not conceive it to be any disparagement to the learned gentleman who now held the office of sheriff of the smaller counties referred to to say that he was not altogether the person most likely to be selected by the Government for the Sheriffship of Fife. The course proposed was the same as had been adopted when other large and small counties were to be united—for example, Peebles and Linlithgow were to be added to Edinburgh, not Edinburgh to Peebles or Linlithgow to Edinburgh; Bute to Renfrew, not Renfrew to Bute; and Banff to Inverness, not Inverness to Banff. The Government had proposed that the Sheriffdom of Kinross should, on a vacancy occurring, be annexed to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Fife, but not that the Sheriffdom of Fife should, in the event of a vacancy, be annexed to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Kinross. In proposing that small should be annexed to large counties, instead of large counties to small ones, the Government had followed both the precedent laid down by the only previous Act relating to the amalgamation of sheriffdoms, but also the dictates of reason and good sense. In conclusion, he begged leave to inform his right hon. and learned Friend that before he (Mr. Gordon) saw this Bill the Sheriffdom of Fife was no longer vacant, and that it was not vacant at the present moment.

MR. GORDON said, he had listened to his right hon. and learned Friend's speech with very great regret. It was a most unfortunate thing that steps had been taken to fill up a sheriffdom which was the subject of a recommendation on the part of the Commissioners. With reference to the learned gentleman who filled the office of Sheriff of Linlithgow, Clackmannan, and Kinross, he begged it to be distinctly understood that he did not hold one of the smallest sheriffships in Scotland. He occupied the office formerly filled by that renowned lawyer, Lord Moncreiff, the father of the Lord Justice Clerk; and this gentleman had discharged his duties to the entire satisfaction of those under his jurisdiction. What he complained of was that, in attempting to deal with a vacancy which necessarily fell to be dealt with by this Bill, and which admittedly had existed three months, they were told that the vacancy had been filled up, and that, therefore, they could not carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners for effecting economy. Under these circumstances, he submitted that the Amendment ought to receive the sanction of the Committee.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, the real question seemed to be, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon) or Her Majesty's Government should appoint the Sheriff of Fife. A legal gentleman of high standing had been appointed, and he hoped the Committee would support the decision of the Government.

MR. MILLER said, the Lord Advocate seemed to have overlooked the fact that the combined Sheriffship of Linlithgow, Clackmannan, and Kinross was a very large one; and he would further remind him that the Sheriff of Peebles, Bute, and Renfrew, three comparatively insignificant counties, was not long ago lifted from that position and made Sheriff of Perthshire, one of the most important counties of Scotland. This was less a personal matter than one of saving, by reducing the number of sheriffs in accordance with the recommendation of the Commission; and he did not see anything wrong in proposing to join Fife to Clackmannan and Kinross on the occasion of a vacancy in the office of sheriff. He trusted the Committee would support the carrying out of the recommendation of the Commission and the reduction of the number of sheriffs.

MR. McLAGAN inferred from the announcement that the vacancy was filled that the Amendment must fall to the ground; still he could not allow the discussion to close without bearing testimony to the able and efficient way in which the Member for Linlithgowshire

—he meant the Sheriff—had discharged his duties. It by no means followed because a man was sheriff of a small county that he was inefficient, and not fit to hold office in a large county; and, indeed, an instance to the contrary had just been cited. If the vacancy had not been filled up he should have supported the Amendment; but as it had been filled up there was no use in continuing the discussion.

MR. DYCE NICOL said, he must draw attention to the economy of the Government in regard to Scotland. When there was an opportunity of reducing the number of sheriffs by one, they had taken the opportunity of appointing two instead of one. He regretted exceedingly that the discussion had taken a personal turn. The gentleman referred to had been known to him many years, and he had taken a high position in the Courts of Law.

MR. BRUCE said, the effect of the Amendment, if carried, would be to revoke the appointment of a sheriff already made by the Crown. In making legal appointments, there was something else besides economy to be considered, and, without disparagement to the Sheriff of Clackmannan and Kinross, they felt it necessary to appoint a younger man to be Sheriff of Fife, and one more fit for the special work to be performed. It was with reference to fitness and not solely to economy, that the appointment was made.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he wished to know when the appointment was made?

MR. BRUCE said, it was made about a fortnight ago. The fact of the appointment was made public at the time, and when the hon. Member for Fife (Sir Robert Anstruther) put a Question to him on the subject, he stated in detail the course the Government intended to take not only with respect to Fife, but also as regarded other counties.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 9, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Union of counties to complete as regards jurisdiction, &c. of sheriff, and powers, privileges, &c. of procurators, clerks, and officers of courts).

MR. DYCE NICOL, in rising to move the omission of the clause, said, that the powers given by this clause and Clause 12 were so large and indefinite as to cause the greatest alarm in those counties affected as to how they would be carried out. While the reduction of the number of sheriffs was generally approved of, the feeling was equally strong that the rights and privileges of the counties proposed to be united by this Bill should be preserved, as in the Clause 4 of Act passed in 1853, Vict. 16 and 17, c. 92, the insertion of which he proposed to move in the Bill. There would be no objection, he thought, to the united counties being divided into districts, with a resident sheriff-substitute in each county town; and when he mentioned that the criminal business devolving on the sheriff-substitute resident in Stonehaven exceeded that of the same officer in Aberdeen and Peterhead, arising from a large portion of such being done by the municipal magistrates, of whom there were none in Kincardineshire, and that of the 33 counties in Scotland, 22 had fewer trials with jury than that county, the Committee would see, he hoped, that the residence of the sheriff-substitute should be fixed by statute in such a town, but authorizing him to devote a considerable portion of his time to the judicial business of Aberdeenshire. He might also mention that, in several of our county towns, there were recently erected expensive Court-houses, and there was a society of procurators who had settled on the faith of a continuance of a Court there, and that he trusted that the Committee would not, without full consideration, interfere in any manner with the interests of those gentlemen. There was also no allusion to the Commissary Courts; and it was not stated whether the extended jurisdiction of the sheriff and the privileges of the procurators were to extend to those Courts as well as to those of the sheriff. He had every confidence that the Secretary of State for the Home Department would do nothing to interfere with the convenience of all parties, but endeavour to facilitate the administration of justice; however, the recent economical experiments in the Courts of Justice in England naturally made the public nervous as to leaving such powers, as given by these clauses, in the hands of Government free from all Parliamentary control. This Bill respected the rights of sheriffs, and, by a new clause, the Lord Advocate took powers to give them increased salaries; but while the sheriffs-substitute had to un-

union with Fife. He was disposed to concur in the reasonableness of their desires, and he had accordingly prepared Amendments to effect a union between Clackmannan and Stirling instead of a union with Fife. A legal gentleman of high standing had been appointed, and he hoped the Committee would support the decision of the Government.

MR. MILLER said, the Lord Advocate overlooked the fact that the combined counties of Linlithgow, Clackmannan, and Kinross formed a large sheriffship, and could not well be classed with the small sheriffships of Peebles or Bute. So far from the sheriff of the combined counties not being eligible for such a county as Fife, it was not long since a sheriff of those counties was removed to the County of Perth, one of the important counties of Scotland. This was not a personal matter—it was one of economy—by reducing the number of sheriffs in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners. He could not see why the sheriffship of the combined counties should not embrace Fife, Linlithgow being placed under the Sheriff of Edinburgh as provided, thereby rendering a fresh appointment unnecessary. He trusted the Committee would support the reduction of the sheriffs.

MR. M'LAGAN inferred from the announcement that the vacancy was filled that the Amendment must fall to the ground; still he could not allow the discussion to close without bearing testimony to the able and efficient way in which the Member for Linlithgowshire—he meant the Sheriff—had discharged his duties. Clause 10 (Union of counties to complete as regards jurisdiction, &c. of sheriff, and powers, privileges, &c. of procurators, clerks, and officers of courts).

MR. DYCE NICOL, in rising to move the omission of the clause, said, that the powers given by this clause and Clause 12 were so large and indefinite as to

While the reduction of the number of sheriffs was generally approved of, the feeling was equally strong that the rights and privileges of the counties proposed to be united by this Bill should be preserved, as in Clause 4 of the Act passed in 1853, Vict. 16 and 17, c. 92, the insertion of which he proposed to move in the Bill. dertake additional work and to accept of a complete change of the conditions under which they accepted office, there was no provision for increase of remuneration to them. It was acknowledged how necessary it was for the general management of our county business that we should have a resident magistrate in each county town. For these reasons, unless the right hon. Gentleman could propose any mode by which the individuality of the counties affected was preserved, and the convenience and interests of the inhabitants protected, he should go to a Division for the rejection of these clauses.

MR. LOCH supported the Amendment, not so much because he thought the clause under discussion would confer objectionable powers, as because the clause would, if passed in conjunction with the clause following it, fail altogether to carry out the wishes of the people of Scotland in relation to the subject-matter of the whole Bill. So far the Bill had dealt with a view of the question upon which the people of Scotland were unanimous—namely, the reduction of the number of sheriffs, and grouping certain counties together. But that Bill took care to preserve the individual jurisdiction of the several counties, and the convenience of the public was considered by the sheriffs going to convenient places in each county and holding Courts in such places as were nearest to the persons having causes to be tried. The present proposal would produce an entirely different state of things, and would act in a manner prejudicial to the general body of the suitors; and therefore if the Government thought it necessary to make such a division of counties as was proposed by the clause, they ought to bring in a separate Act of Parliament for the purpose. He should support the proposition to omit the clause.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 10.—(Mr. Dyce Nicol.)

MR. GORDON said, the discussion had turned upon the question of the suppression of certain offices, and he had in the abstract no objection to such suppression, so soon as existing life-interests should have come to an end; but he objected to the proposition of the Bill for the reason that it dealt with the question in far too general a way, and would produce many difficulties in its carrying out. He had expected that the hon. and learned Lord Advocate would have inserted some provision in order to have made his clause more generally acceptable. He thought it would be necessary that there should be a special Bill brought in for the purpose of regulating the proceedings before the Sheriff Courts; and it would follow, as a necessary portion of such Bill, that arrangements should be made with regard to the sheriff-clerks, who would be left on the same footing as that upon which they were left by the Bill of 1863. Great difficulties would arise from the appointment of the three sheriff-clerks—for who could tell for which of the amalgamated counties he was to act? He thought that the Committee should agree to the clauses which had been already passed, and refer the other question to future consideration. The power proposed to be given to the Secretary of State was one which he did not think such an officer ought to possess.

MR. M'LAREN thought it would be unwise to stop the Bill at its present stage, as Clause 10, and that which followed, formed, in his opinion, the most valuable part of the Bill.

MR. ORR EWING said, he was not surprised to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) approving this portion of the Bill, for his hon. Friend held rather extraordinary views as to the powers of the Government in general. He thought that this was not the time at which to legislate upon this subject. A Commission, appointed two years ago, had taken most voluminous evidence, and had reported thereon to the House, but the Report had not yet been published; and therefore he thought the Bill—or at least these provisions of the Bill—would have been advantageously left till next year, when public opinion and the opinion of the House would have ripened with regard to it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had quite failed to find in the observations that had been made any real objection to the clause under discussion. A great deal had been said about certain large powers proposed to be given to the Secretary of State and on the subject of a Bill to be introduced in next Session in order to regulate the procedure in Sheriff Courts; but he begged to say that the Bill conferred no power upon the Government, and did not propose to abolish any office whatsoever. The inconvenience arising from the omission of a similar power from the Act passed about 10 years ago had been greatly felt, and he had therefore prepared this clause. The clause was necessary in the interest of the public, and he hoped the Committee would agree to it.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Courts to be held, and duties to be discharged by sheriffs.)

MR. GORDON moved to insert words to provide that sheriffs, whether appointed before or subsequent to the passing of the Act, should be relieved from the duty of attending sessions. The clause, as it stood, was entirely opposed to the recommendations of the Commission, and he wished to restore it to the form so recommended by removing the necessity on the part of sheriffs to attend who were not counsel practising in the Courts in which, as they now stood, they were compelled to attend. The Report made by the Commission in 1834 was favourable to the view which he took; but, at the same time, he thought the question might well be left to come up in the Bill which must be brought forward very early in order to rearrange and readjust the procedure of the Sheriff Courts.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought the provision as it stood was a salutary one for the reason that it provided for the cases of sheriffs who were not practising barristers, and did not render it compulsory to attend the Courts or to perform an operation very like a forced march through Westminster Hall during the whole of the time when the Courts were sitting.

MR. M'LAREN said, it was well known that a large number of sheriffs did not practise at the bar, and therefore he did not think it right they should be compelled to attend Courts.

Clause 12 (Courts to be held and duties to be discharged by sheriff's substitute.)

MR. DYCE NICOL, in pursuance of his previous Notice, moved to omit the clause.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 36: Majority 29.

The Lord Advocate

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would propose after Clause 6, to insert a new clause (Counties of Wigtown and Kirkcudbright to be united with the County of Dumfries).

Clause brought up and read a first time.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he desired to make a suggestion with reference to this clause. At present the counties of Wigtown and Kirkcudbright, in the district of Galloway, formed one sheriffdom, but it was now proposed to unite them with the county of Dumfries in one sheriffdom. He thought a better arrangement might be made by uniting the county of Kirkcudbright to the county of Dumfries, and the county of Wigtown to the county of Ayr. The county of Kirkcudbright and the county of Dumfries had one militia regiment, and they had many other things in common; and the counties of Wigtown and Ayr had also many things in common which Wigtown had not in common with Dumfries. In addition to that he might mention that very recently Her Majesty's Government appointed a noble relative of his to the Lord-Lieutenancy of the county of Ayr, he being already Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Wigtown—the militia regiment, the buildings for the militia, the Lord-Lieutenancy, and various other matters being in common for the two counties. He thought the various local interests would be better considered by uniting Wigtown with Ayr and Kirkcudbright with Dumfries, than by the proposed arrangement which was here suggested. He felt convinced that the best arrangement for public business would be that which he had indicated. Three counties were too much for one sheriff to manage—at election times impossible. It would be inconvenient for him to propose an Amendment to that effect at this stage of the Bill; but if, on further inquiry, the learned Lord Advocate found it convenient and agreeable to make this change, perhaps he would do so on the Report. He believed it would be for the convenience of the inhabitants of that part of the country to make the change.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should be happy to consider the suggestion upon the Report. In the meantime it was proper to state that the union proposed in the clause was that which had been suggested by a Royal Commission.

Remaining clauses agreed to; Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

BANKRUPT LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 117.)

(The Marquess of Clanricarde.)

ORDER FOR THIRD READING DISCHARGED.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that he proposed to move that the Order for the Third Reading be discharged; but in doing so he desired, nevertheless, to impress on their Lordships the importance of the object of the measure—which was to bring non-traders under the operation of the Bankruptcy Law, a principle which worked well in England, and, as had recently been ruled, was applicable even to a Member of their Lordships' House. At a time when a feeling in favour of the repeal of the Union was growing in Ireland, it was very impolitic to neglect questions which were of great importance to business men, who never engaged in any agitation, for such neglect would be made use of as a proof that the British Parliament did not attend to the interests of Ireland. He hoped the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack would give him an assurance that this question would be taken up early next year by the Irish Law Officers.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad the noble Marquess proposed to withdraw the Bill. The new English Bankruptcy Law had not yet been sufficiently tested to show how far it was desirable to extend it to Ireland; and the present Bill, having for its object the extension of the old law to non-traders, would give increased scope to a provision which was found very fruitful in fraud in England—namely, that which enabled persons to become bankrupts on their own petition. Having had no opportunity of communicating with the Irish Law Officers, he could give no promise that the Government would bring in a comprehensive measure next Session; and Parliament having for two Sessions been a good deal occupied with Irish questions, he was not sure that the task could be then undertaken. He trusted, however, that if it were taken up it would be dealt with in a comprehensive manner, whether as regarded traders or non-traders.

Motion agreed to.

Order for the Third Reading discharged.

MEDICAL OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION BILL—(No. 169.)

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the object of the measure was to extend to medical officers who had not devoted their whole time to the parish the power of retiring on a pension, with the consent of the guardians, if 60 years of age or infirm. This provision was at present confined to officers who had given their whole time to the parish; but the former were, in general, a far higher class, whom it was desirable to encourage in taking these offices. Moreover, the poor were injured by the continuance in office of infirm or aged men. In order to prevent corrupt arrangements, and in deference to the objections of his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond), he would propose an Amendment providing that a medical officer desiring to retire on a pension should satisfy the Poor Law Inspector or some person appointed by the Poor Law Board as to the grounds of his retirement.

Amendment moved, to insert the following clause :—

"No pension shall be obtained by any person under this Act on the ground of permanent infirmity of mind or body unless the Poor Law Inspector of the district, or some person authorized in that behalf by the Poor Law Board, shall have first certified that in his opinion such officer has by reason of such infirmity become incapable of performing the duties of his office with efficiency."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND admitted that the Amendment of his noble Friend went a long way towards meeting his objections to the Bill. His objection was, that to require the medical officers to devote the whole of their time to the duties of their post was a proposal vicious in principle; and the Amendment did not altogether provide a remedy. He should not, however, offer any further opposition to the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

The Report of the Amendment to be received on Thursday next.

NEW ZEALAND (GUARANTEE OF LOAN)

BILL—(No. 207.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

EARL GREY said, that of all modes of assisting a Colony the guarantee of a loan was the worst. Most of the Colonies had shown a disposition to abuse their powers of borrowing money, and New Zealand itself was a striking instance of this. It was all very well to say that a guarantee cost this country nothing. A young man was urged on a like plea to back a bill for a friend. Moreover, if a guarantee was given to one Colony why not to another? He strongly objected to the Bill.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that as he had himself on one occasion, while expressing his preference of military aid, suggested the guarantee of a loan, he could not be said to be entirely opposed to them. On the occasion to which he referred the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) took him to task for so doing, and laid down a series of admirable economic principles, in which he urged that it was unwise and altogether objectionable to guarantee loans to our Colonies, and said that it was very much against the interests of the Colonies themselves that they should be encouraged to borrow, and the noble Earl proceeded to say that had he given a guarantee to New Zealand the Colony would have been burdened with an additional debt of £1,500,000; and that its future credit would thereby have been injured. In that remark he (the Earl of Carnarvon) quite agreed, and he could not help asking what there could possibly be to induce him two months after making that statement to depart from so sound a principle. Having been charged by the noble Earl with exaggeration when on a former occasion he dwelt on the serious danger of some great catastrophe through our policy towards New Zealand, he wished to justify himself by reference to a Memorandum of the Colonial Minister of New Zealand which had since been published. The Memorandum stated substantially the result of that decision was that the Imperial Government virtually retired from the great colonizing work which it had undertaken; that it told the colonists and Natives to do what they liked, for it had ceased to care what might happen; that it even refused to leave troops if the Colony paid for them, on account of the contingencies which this would involve; and that New Zealand was thus told that it had ceased to be a part of the Empire. It added that the Assembly would possibly think that on so important a matter as the severance of a Colony from the Empire the Imperial Legislature should express an opinion, and that possibly the course of public opinion, already in a measure expressed, would induce Her Majesty's Government to regret the invitation to New Zealand to leave the Empire implied in the noble Earl's despatch. Now, he pronounced no opinion on this Memorandum, which was somewhat voluminous, but their Lordships could read it for themselves if they desired; but he referred to it in order to show that in stating that we were on the verge of a serious catastrophe in New Zealand he did not outstep the limits of truth and was guilty of no exaggeration.

LORD LYVEDEN said, he had always contended that the Colonies should govern themselves, fight their own battles, and pay their own expenses, and he approved the withdrawal of the troops from New Zealand, as their presence tended to promote war with the Natives and harsh conduct on the part of the settlers—just as their presence in Canada encouraged, if it did not excite, the notion of some persons in the United States that they should attack that Colony. He objected also, as a rule, to guarantees, because in many instances they had been improperly applied; but this, being for the specific and pacific purpose of making roads, which it was true might be advantageous in case of war, but which likewise extended civilization and improvement, and promoted intercourse with the Natives, was of an exceptional character. The present state of New Zealand, which encouraged us to anticipate for it a peaceful and prosperous career, was a triumphant refutation of the charges and animadversions which had been directed at his noble Friend (Earl Granville)—especially by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon). There could not be a greater mistake than to suppose that our present colonial policy implied any desire for separation. He believed, on the contrary, that self-government would unite the Colonies to us more closely than any other policy; and that, with the love of independence which Britons in all parts of the world should possess, they would be thankful to us for pursuing such a policy. He presumed the Memorandum mentioned by the noble Earl had not been printed in the Blue Books? [The Earl of CARNARVON intimated that it had not.] In that case, as it was an important document, he hoped his noble Friend would lay it before the House.

EARL GRANVILLE admitted that his noble Friend (Earl Grey) had always consistently objected to the guarantee of colonial loans. He was also, however, the advocate of an opinion which had not been entertained by Governments for many years, and he believed was not held by the country at large—namely, that we should retrench the liberty we had given to our self-governing Colonies, in order to assume greater control over their affairs than of late years we had done. As to the refusal of military assistance, he was excused from defending it by the remarks of his noble Friend (Lord Lyveden), or it would be easy to show that the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) was not perfectly consistent with himself. He wrote last autumn a letter to The Times advocating the guarantee of a loan without reference to any specific expenditure, military or otherwise. Now, this would have been a direct encouragement to the Colony to continue their proceedings against the Natives, instead of adopting the policy which had answered so well—that of limiting the war to the greatest degree, and cultivating friendly relations with the great majority of the Natives. For his own part, he was bound to say that, absolutely and in point of consistency, he could not defend this guarantee; but as an exceptional measure it was perfectly defensible and desirable. The definitive carrying out of the policy of withdrawing the troops, which had been the object of many successive Secretaries of State, naturally caused irritation in the Colony, as the withdrawal of privileges usually did; and the conviction of the colonists that they were very much ill-used was materially strengthened by violent letters and speeches in this country, which described our object as that of cutting them off from the mother country. Indeed, he must say that this feeling was not without some encouragement from the letters and frequent speeches of the noble Earl. In that state of things the colonial Ministers wrote the Memorandum referred to by the noble Earl, containing vague menaces as to the future which he never for a moment believed, notwithstanding the encouragement they received in England, they would think of putting into effect. He would, however, rather not go into a discussion on this subject, which would re-open sores which it was the object of this small guarantee to heal. It was desirable to employ the friendly Natives, who had behaved admirably as soldiers, in some useful occupation, such as making roads and public works, thus not only developing the resources of the country, but tending to pacify it. The Government, therefore, after much consideration, decided that this was an exception to the rule which they might fairly propose to Parliament as a graceful concession, which would soothe the somewhat acrimonious feelings which had attended the carrying out of our policy as regarded New Zealand.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter
before Five o'clock.

IRELAND—BANKS OF THE IRISH COAST, QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade, if he has received information from the Ballast Board that important changes have taken place in the banks of the Irish Coast between Tuskar and Dublin; and, if so, whether the attention of the Admiralty has been called to the same, with the view of having them promptly re-surveyed?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, in reply, that the Commissioners of the Irish Lights had informed the Board of Trade that the commander of their vessel employed in the lighthouse service had reported some alterations of the banks between Tuskar and Dublin from those laid down in the Admiralty charts. The subject was now under the consideration of the Admiralty, and the Irish Lights Commissioners had been requested to give more detailed information as to the changes.

CHRISTMAS DAY.—QUESTION.

MR. PEMBERTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, inasmuch as Christmas Day this year falls on Sunday, the Government will bring in a short Bill to authorize the closing of the Bank of England and other Banks on the day before or the day after Christmas Day, and thus insure a holiday to the numerous persons employed in such establishments?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he regretted very much that clerks and others would lose the holiday to which they were accustomed; but he did not think it would be consistent with the public convenience that he should bring in a Bill for the purpose referred to at that period of the Session.

LAND TRANSFER ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. CUBITT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate carrying out the recommendation contained in the Report of the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the operation of the Land Transfer Act, and the present condition of the registry of deeds for the county of Middlesex, in favour of the discontinuance of that office; whether any steps have been taken by the registrars since the publication of that Report to adopt one uniform system of fees, and to reduce the fees charged to a scale in accordance with the law; whether the registrarship vacant since 1867, and in the gift of the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench still remains vacant, and whether there is any intention of filling up that office; and, under what authority the emoluments of the vacant registrarship have been divided between the two surviving registrars, and if he can inform the House what additional emoluments have been in consequence received by the holders of these offices, and what was the net sum received by them in 1869?

Mr. BRUOE said, in reply, that the Land Transfer Bill, now in the House of Lords, provided for the closing of the Middlesex Registry. No alteration in the fees taken in the Middlesex Registry had been made since the publication of the Land Transfer Report. The vacant registrarship had not been filled up by the Chief Justice, and there was no intention of filling it up; the Chief Justice understanding that it was the wish of the Government and the House of Commons that the office should remain vacant. The effect of this vacancy had not as yet been of any public benefit. The fees were of fixed amount, and were divisible among the registrars, and a vacancy only left a larger sum divisible among them. It appeared that the Act of Queen Anne, constituting the Registry, gives the fees to the registrars; who accordingly divide the total amount among themselves, subject to the deduction of one-fourth, which under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 21, was paid to the Queen's Remembrancer, to be by him accounted for to the Treasury. In 1869 additional emoluments to the amount of £640 were received by each registrar and the Treasury on behalf of the Queen's Remembrancer, and the nett sum received by each registrar and the Treasury was $2,561 14s. 3d.

THAMES EMBANKMENT.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord OTHO FITZGERALD) reported Her Majesty's Answer to Address [8th July] as follows:—

I have received your Address, praying that I will give directions that no Public Offices be erected on that portion of the Thames Embankment, which is reserved to the Crown, and which has been reclaimed from the River at the cost of the Ratepayers of the Metropolis.

As no Public Office can be erected on the ground in question without a Vote of Parliament, the House has in its own hands the means of giving effect to the prayer of the Address, and My Government will not ask for such a Vote, unless they should have reason to suppose that it is likely to meet with the approval of the House.

If the Address were intended to exclude all employment of the land for profit by building, it would be necessary to observe, that the property was granted by a recent Act in exchange for valuable interests; that such a limitation of its use would appear not to have been within the contemplation of the Statute, and that if fit to be effected, it ought to be imposed by the authority of the Legislature, in a Bill for the purpose, which would give opportunity for the examination of the whole case in its present and prospective bearings.

Should such a Bill be proposed for consideration on its merits, I will give directions that its free discussion shall not be hindered by any formal difficulty which it may be in the power of the Crown to remove, nor will any step be taken during the current year to appropriate the land, or interfere with the final decision of the question.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord OTHO FITZGERALD) reported Her Majesty's Answer to Address [8th July] as follows:—

I have received your Address praying that a Commission may be issued to inquire into the existing state of the Law relating to Friendly Societies.

And I have given directions that a Commission shall issue for the purpose which you have requested.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (re-committed)

(Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Mr. DICKINSON rose to move a new clause. He explained that there were many parishes large enough to maintain one good school but not to maintain two; that in most of them the Church of England school was the largest and best; that conditions imposed by deed upon the managers drove the minority of Dissenters to set up a rival school; and that it was desirable to enable the managers to get rid of these conditions, and so concentrate the pecuniary resources of the place, economize teaching power, and improve the character of the education for all the children. With this object he moved to insert, after Clause 22, the following clause:—

“The managers of a public elementary school may, with the sanction of the Education Department, and with the consent of all parties whose consent may be required by the Education Department, alter any regulations to which the management of such school may be subject, attaching any special qualification or disqualification to the office of a manager or teacher of such school, or giving any person not being a teacher any special superintendence or authority in the management or teaching of such school.”

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would like to know what the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President thought of this clause? To him it seemed to be altogether unnecessary, regard being had to the provision contained in the 22nd clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not say that the clause was necessary; but neither did he think it would be injurious. It seemed to him that the 22nd clause, taken in connection with the 24th clause, was sufficient for the purpose. At the same time, he saw no objection to the clause.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

The House divided:—Ayes 86; Noes 53: Majority 33.

Clause read a second time, and added.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON rose to move the following clause:—

(Exemption from rating.)

“In any case where a Public Elementary School exists at the time of the passing of this Act, in any duly constituted ecclesiastical district, and where such school fulfils all the conditions required by this Act as to management and efficiency, and is sufficient for the wants of the district, and where such school has been built and maintained, and continues to be maintained by private and voluntary funds (except the amount derived from the children's pence, and the Government Grant in aid), the person or persons who thus maintain such school in an efficient state by such voluntary funds, shall not be liable to be rated in respect of any land or property within such district to the support of any other school in any other part of the same parish.”

He was anxious to make one more appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council to mitigate the stringency of the power of rating by the adoption of the principle of this clause. If his right hon. Friend would give this subject his full consideration, he would see the clause would not injure the object of the Bill, but would render it more efficient. If it were rejected, the effect would be that a vast number of the voluntary schools now in the kingdom would be extinguished. He would put a case—which he knew to be no imaginary one—of a parish which was divided into three parts, and each of the outlying districts had provided for itself a new church and school. These schools fulfilled all the requirements of this Bill; they were for the education of the children in their district, and were in no sense private schools. What he proposed was that these outlying districts, being thus provided with schools in the full meaning of the Act, should not be called upon to pay the rate necessary for the central part of the parish, in which case they would be called upon to pay the school rates twice over. In that case he was afraid the parties who had hitherto supported the schools in the separated ecclesiastical districts would withdraw their subscriptions and leave those schools to be supported by the rates, when they would have less to pay than they now did in subscriptions.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would excuse him if he declined to enter at any length again into the argument why he could not accept this clause. It had been debated over and over again, and they could not renew the argument on its present stage. The question of dividing parishes had been debated, and it had been decided that in this matter of education it was impossible to depart from the ordinary definition of parishes. The question of exempting the subscribers to voluntary schools had been discussed on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Adderley), and it was found that there was an almost unanimous feeling of the Committee against it. According to the hon. Baronet's proposal a man might escape the rate altogether by giving a mere nominal subscription to a voluntary school.

Mr. Dickinson

MR. CANDLISH said, if these subscribers to the voluntary schools were to be exempted from the rates, then the schools would practically become rate-aided schools.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that it was unjust to make the subscribers to a voluntary school liable for the rates as well. It had been said that private charity did not exempt a man from the poor rates; but he might remark that poor rates had a tendency to dry up the sources of private charity; and he was satisfied that the tendency of this Bill, as it stood, was to convert all the voluntary schools of the country into rate-aided schools.

MR. MELLY said, he thought the operation of this Bill would be the reverse of drying up the streams of private charity. He believed that the power of control which the managers of voluntary schools had over them would always induce wealthy and benevolent persons to support them.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he hoped his hon. Friend would press this clause to a Division. He believed that if some such provision as the clause pointed to were not made, the voluntary schools in the kingdom would soon be dried up. As to the statement that this clause would allow those who gave a merenominal subscription to be exempted from the rates, he did not think that would follow from the clause, which was drawn up in a very stringent manner.

LORD HENLEY said, that if the district was already provided with the means of education there would be no need for a rate.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON explained that his clause referred to a divided parish, where one division had done its duty and the other had not; and the object of his clause was that the division which had done its duty should not be called on to contribute for the division which had not.

MR. COLLINS supported the clause. Suppose the not very uncommon case of a parish containing two outlying townships, with an agricultural district between the two towns, which had little in common between them except the accident of being included in the same parish—in such a case they ought to be treated separately.

MR. DIXON said, he hoped the Government would not consent to the clause. They had heard much of the benevolence and charity of the subscribers to the voluntary schools, and he, for one, was willing to believe in that charity; but it would appear, from the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that that charity was only a pretext to escape the rates.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, the hon. Gentleman did not understand the clause. It had nothing to do with individual subscriptions. What the clause provided for was this—that where a district was, or was declared by the School Commissioners to be, sufficiently provided with education, that district should not be called to help another district that had not done its duty, simply from the fact that both were included in one parish.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS reminded the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council that this was the very difficulty that used to occur in church rates. It was the constant complaint of an outlying district that when they had provided a church for themselves they were still called upon to provide church rates for the mother church. The same injustice, substituting a school rate for a church rate, was about to be perpetrated under this Bill.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 70; Noes 120: Majority 50.

MR. M'ARTHUR moved, in Clause 8, page 4, at end of clause, add—

"Provided there shall be in every district one such school which is conducted in accordance with the regulations contained in the 1st and 2nd sub-sections of Clause 7 of this Act."

The effect would be that if there was one school only in a district it would not come under the operation of the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 5, after the word "district," to insert the words "Provided there shall be in every district one such school which is conducted in accordance with the regulations contained in the 1st and 2nd sub-sections of Clause 7 of this Act."—(Mr. M'Arthur.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that the proposal had already been fully discussed. No school would receive any Parliamentary Grant which did not accept the conditions of the 7th clause in reference to the Conscience Clause. The penalty on such a school would be that it would receive no public money, and they might rely on it that there would be very few such schools.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, there might be but one school in the parish, and that without a Conscience Clause, and he asked where was the justice of requiring the children of Dissenters to attend that school or no school at all? He wanted some security that there should be a public elementary school in every district, with a Conscience Clause.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM asked if a child could be compelled to attend a non-efficient school?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that no child could be compelled to attend any but a public elementary school. The responsibility would be on the Education Department to refuse aid to an unsuitable school.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment. By doing so they would be practically ignoring 5,000 or 6,000 schools now giving a sound education to the poor children of the country, and which had been so long engaged in that excellent work.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 168: Majority 102.

MR. STEVENSON moved, in Clause 11, line 8, after "board," insert "or with respect to any borough by the Council." As the clause now stood the parties to put the Act in motion by applying to the Education Department were the ratepayers, who were to select the school Board. He proposed that it should be left as it stood originally in the Bill, and that in any borough the Town Council should have power to put the Act in motion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was quite willing to accept the Amendment as an alternative. It was very desirable to leave the initiative in the hands of the parishioners, and it might be beneficial to give the initiative also to the Town Council in boroughs.

MR. M'ARTHUR moved, in Clause 14, page 6, line 4, after "regulations," insert—

"Provided always, That no person whatever except the school teacher shall give religious instruction in the school, and that no clergyman or minister of any religious denomination or member of any religious order shall be eligible to be appointed a school teacher."

The great object of the Bill, as he understood it, was to give unsectarian education in rate-aided schools; but it would be impossible to give that education if those who were in Holy Orders or the ministers of various denominations were allowed to take their rank as teachers in these schools.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 4, after the word "regulations," to insert the words "Provided always, That no person whatever except the school teacher shall give religious instruction in the school, and that no clergyman or minister of any religious denomination or member of any religious order shall be eligible to be appointed a school teacher."—(Mr. M'Arthur.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment. It related to a point which the Department would have to consider; but if this Amendment were inserted in an Act of Parliament, it might lead to a great deal of inconvenience. The first part of the Amendment must be left to the discretion of the school Boards; and as to the second part it was very difficult indeed to define what was a minister, for Wesleyan local preachers and members of the Society of Friends, who followed secular occupations and also addressed their co-religionists on the Sabbath, might be said to be ministers, and yet could hardly be considered unfit to act as school teachers.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CAWLEY moved, in Clause 16, line 29, to leave out—

"And every act or omission of any member of the school Board, or manager appointed by them, or any person under the control of the Board, shall be deemed to be permitted by the Board," in line 32, inclusive. This would be a final clause, and if the principle contained in these words were admitted into our legislation we should sap the foundations of every Board and Council acting in the nature of a corporate body. Without these words the clause gave absolute power to the Education Department to decide on any question as to whether a school Board had or had not complied with its regulations. If these words remained the school Board would be at the absolute mercy of any manager, teacher, or single member of the Board who chose of his own free will to violate the rules laid down by the Education Department. If the rules were broken by any such person, even against the wishes of the school Board, that Board would be held to be in default, and could be ousted from their place.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 29, to leave out from the word "and" to the word "board," in line 32, both inclusive.—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he was informed that the retention of the words referred to was absolutely necessary in order to work the clause. The school Board must be held to be responsible for the acts of their servants; if not, it would be very easy for any school Board to defeat the clause altogether.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the clause as it stood went further than merely to make the school Board responsible for the acts of its servants. It made the whole Board responsible for the acts of every single member.

Mr. HENLEY said, this curious state of things might result if the clause remained in its present shape: if a manager did anything in absolute contradiction of the orders and will of the school Board, that Board would be held to have sanctioned and approved it. How, then, could a school Board dismiss a manager for doing that which an Act of Parliament declared they had sanctioned?

Mr. BRUCE said, no advantage would be taken of a school Board in a case like that.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, there was no option in the matter. The word "shall" made the clause imperative, and not optional.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. CANDLISH moved, in Clause 20, page 8, lines 4 and 5, to leave out "in the month of November." As the clause stood no proceedings could be taken under the Act to acquire land compulsorily, except in the month of November. The adoption of his Amendment would enable the preliminary steps to be taken in such a case at any time.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he would accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CAWLEY moved, in Clause 22, page 11, to leave out lines 13, 14, and 15. The objection to the clause was that as it stood it was in the power of the managers of a school to transfer the school to the school Board without the sanction of the trustees in whom the school might be vested. In the great majority of cases the school managers had merely been created by the Revised Code for the purposes of the annual grant, and it was not reasonable to give them the power of overriding the trustees.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 13, to leave out from the word "The" to the word "Section," in line 15, both inclusive.—(Mr. Cawley.)

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, it would be difficult to work the clause without the retention of the words which were proposed to be left out. He would, however, endeavour to meet the views of the hon. Gentleman in another way by inserting the words—"after the expiration of six months."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. CAWLEY moved to leave out all the words from line 29 to line 34 inclusive, on the ground that they gave to the managers of a voluntary school—whether the legal interest in the school-house or endowment was vested in them or in some person as trustee for them or the school—absolute power to convey to the school Board all such interest in the school-house or endowment as was vested in them or in the trustee. He greatly objected to giving such a power to an undefined body of managers, who might be here to-day and away to-morrow.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 29, to leave out from the word "when" to the word "arrangement," in line 34, both inclusive.—(Mr. Cawley.)

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he regretted he could not agree to the proposal of the hon. Member. If the words were omitted, great obstacles might be thrown in the way of the transfer of the schools; and for all practical purposes he believed that sufficient safeguards had been provided, so as to obviate the evil against which it was sought to guard.

MR. BIRLEY said, the regulations of the Revised Code restricted the choice of managers to a very narrow area, and it was not therefore advisable to give them so much power.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, the section they were discussing merely supplied the machinery.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that in settling the previous clauses, they had conceded the point between his hon. Friend and the Government.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. M'LAREN moved, in Clause 23, line 4, after "same," to insert—"and to pay fees for teaching blind children to read in such schools," the object being the admission of blind children to schools for a special kind of instruction, and the application of a portion of the rates for that purpose. The practice was adopted in Scotland, where the usual payment was £5 a year, and the blind children had, it was found, been much benefited morally by mixing with other children of their own age who were not similarly afflicted.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 4, after the word "same," to insert the words "and to pay fees for teaching blind children to read in such schools."
—(Mr. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WHEELHOUSE supported the Motion, and was anxious to bear his testimony in favour of it. He would suggest that, if possible, the same thing should be done for the deaf and dumb. It had, indeed, been stated that deaf and dumb children could not be taught to read in these schools. But there were signs which might be used by teachers, not themselves specially qualified, as teachers of the deaf and dumb.

MR. W. E. FORSTER advised his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Laren) for the sake of his own clients not to press the Motion. The Bill provided elementary education for all children, which would include the blind and the deaf and dumb. There might be cases where it would be beneficial to the blind to mingle with other children, but there might be cases where it would be disadvantageous; for, if there happened to be a large number of blind children, it would be better to send them to a separate school. If the words were inserted, instead of widening, they would narrow the application of other parts of the Bill, and thus do injury to the interests of the very persons it was the object of his hon. Friend to serve. He trusted, therefore, the Amendment would not be passed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. G. TALBOT moved the insertion of words in Clause 26, which would give "any prison authority in England and Wales" the same power as the clause gave the school Boards of establishing, with the consent of the Education Department, certified industrial schools. In his own county the magistrates found it impossible to carry out the Industrial Schools Acts, because they had not the power of founding schools.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 22, after the word "board," to insert the words "or any prison authority in England or Wales."
—(Mr. John Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER deprecated dealing with any defects in the Industrial Schools Acts, by means of altering a section of the Bill then before the House, especially as those Acts would be taken into consideration by the Government generally, and especially by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce).

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it would be very satisfactory if the Home Secretary would promise to do something to remedy what had been the great defects of these Acts—namely, that they did not give the power of founding schools.

MR. BRUCE said, the Industrial Schools Acts depended for their success on the voluntary machinery which was put in operation. The question was, however, one well worthy of consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DIXON moved, in Clause 27, page 12, line 35, leave out all after "Act," and insert—

"1. In boroughs of one hundred thousand inhabitants and upwards by the council, provided that not less than one-third of the number to be elected shall be elected from persons who, at the time of the election, are not members of such council ;

"2. In all other boroughs by persons whose names are on the burgess roll of such borough for the time being in force ;

"3. And in a parish not situate in the Metropolis by the ratepayers ;

"4. Provided that the School Boards in the Metropolis shall be elected by the parishioners of the parishes therein in manner provided by this Act."

The hon. Member observed that the Bill, as it originally stood, gave power to the Town Council in boroughs to elect school Boards. Objection was taken to that by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) ; and, although it was rejected on a Division, the Government afterwards adopted it. He believed that the principal objection to vesting in Town Councillors the right of electing the school Boards lay in the fact that Town Councillors, as a rule, were unpopular. A strong prejudice existed against them ; and this prejudice was chiefly cherished by men who kept themselves aloof from municipal politics and refused to enter the Town Councils. His opinion, however, was, if the office of Town Councillor were made more honourable, and if the Legislature gave him higher functions to discharge, those men who now kept apart from municipalities would gladly offer to become members of such bodies. He contended that, as a rule, Town Councils honestly and efficiently discharged the elective duties which Parliament had devolved upon them ; and his firm conviction was that if Town Councils were, in this instance, allowed to elect the school Boards, much better representatives would be obtained than if the elections were left in the hands of ratepayers.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 35, to leave out all the words from the word "Act," to the end of the Clause, in order to insert the words,—

"1. In boroughs of one hundred thousand inhabitants and upwards by the council, provided that not less than one-third of the number to be elected shall be elected from persons who, at the time of the election, are not members of such council ;

"2. In all other boroughs by persons whose names are on the burgess roll of such borough for the time being in force ;

"3. And in a parish not situate in the Metropolis by the ratepayers ;

"4. Provided that the School Boards in the Metropolis shall be elected by the parishioners of the parishes therein in manner provided by this Act,"

—(Mr. Dixon),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'in a borough' stand part of the Bill."

MR. RATHBONE trusted the Government would yet retrace their steps upon this point while there was still time, and withdraw a concession which might be injurious and possibly fatal to the working of the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had no wish to check discussion on this subject ; but he would remind the House that it had already been very considerably debated. He admitted that this was one of the most important questions which had come under their notice, and one that was very difficult to deal with. He said that the Government had taken the step they had been induced to take with very great reluctance. They had full confidence in the integrity and ability of the Town Councils ; but the conviction had been forced upon them that in framing an Education Bill they ought to stick either to one principle or the other, and not have two conflicting ones. As the Bill had been originally framed, the principle of indirect representation ran all through it ; but latterly the principle of direct representation had been granted in the case of the metropolis, as well as in the rural districts, and that once admitted Government did not see how one rule was to be laid down for London, and another for the large towns in the country. The ratepayers of the latter would in that case naturally complain. Besides, there were large towns where there was no Town Council ; and the principle of direct representation would also have to be admitted there. He held that it would have been almost impossible to work the Bill according to the principle of indirect election, and, therefore, the Government had adopted the course they had taken.

MR. MUNDELLA agreed that it would be impossible to draw the line at 100,000 inhabitants. He recommended the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) to withdraw his Amendment, in order that the issue might be taken on the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council.

[Consideration.

MR. DIXON acceded to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Sheffield.

MR. COLLINS said, he was very much surprised to hear objections to popular election proceed from the Liberal ranks. He felt sure that election by the rate-payers would give great satisfaction, not, perhaps, to a few members of Town Councils, but to the mass of the population.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, in line 36, to leave out "council," and insert "persons whose names are on the burgess roll of such borough for the time being in force."

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 36, to leave out the word "council," in order to insert the words "persons whose names are on the burgess roll of such borough for the time being in force,"—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)—instead thereof.

MR. DIXON moved the rejection of the Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was satisfied that no greater mistake could be committed than that of leaving the school Boards to be elected by the popular vote. He contended that the best men would shrink from becoming candidates for a seat at such Boards, owing to the turmoil, abuse, and trouble they would have to endure during the election.

MR. LAIRD held that the ratepayers were the persons in whom the power of choosing the school Boards should be vested. He hoped that the Government would persevere with their proposal.

MR. MUNTZ pointed out that the persons chosen by the Town Councils, as managers of charities for instance, were, as a class, superior to those who were chosen by direct popular suffrage, such as the Boards of Guardians. Gentlemen who would be likely to form the best school Boards would not go to the expense of an election contest.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked, that this expense would fall on the education rates, and it would be very much increased indeed by the introduction of the Ballot. He hoped the Amendment would not be carried.

Question put, "That the word 'council' stand part of the Bill."

Mr. Mundella

The House divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 273: Majority 216.

Question, "That the words 'persons whose names are on the burgess roll of such borough for the time being in force' be inserted instead thereof," put, and agreed to.

MR. HOLMS moved, in Clause 36, page 16, sub-section 8, line 42, leave out all after "and," and insert "the chairman of the school Board from among their own number." The best men would be deterred from joining the Board if the chairman were to be nominated by the Department.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would accept the Amendment. The Education Department would be very glad to be relieved from the responsibility of finding a chairman; and the only idea on which they had proceeded was, that as it was necessary to get to work as soon as possible it would be an advantage that the first chairman should be elected by them. Nothing could be more inconvenient than that the London school Board should commence its operations with any feeling of antagonism towards the Education Department, and, therefore, he at once agreed to the suggestion of his hon. Friend, particularly as he understood that the Amendment was approved of by other metropolitan Members. He thought, however, that the school Board should be allowed discretion as to the source from which its chairman should be selected, and he, therefore, hoped the hon. Member would not press the words "from among their own number" in the latter part of the Amendment.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, in page 17, line 3, at end of paragraph 8, add—

"And any subsequent chairman who may afterwards be elected by the Board, may be elected either from the members of the Board or not, and any chairman who is not an elected member of the Board, shall by virtue of his office be a member of the Board, as if he had been so elected."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, in Clause 39, line 25, after "subsequently," add—

"Where a union of districts is proposed the Education Department shall consider whether any public school accommodation is required for the area proposed as the united district instead of for each of the districts constituting such area, and their decision as to the public school accommodation and the notice of such decision shall accordingly refer to such area and not separately to each of the constituent districts."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, in Clause 88, page 34, line 3, at end of clause add—

"If a school Board is formed in the borough of Oxford, one-third of the school Board shall be elected by the University of Oxford, or the Colleges and Halls therein, in such manner as may be directed by the Education Department by an order made under the power contained in the Second Schedule to this Act."

The University was obliged to be brought in separately, or otherwise it would not be rated; and, if rated, it ought to have a share in the representation.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he was surprised at the Amendment being brought forward without due Notice. He did not know whether his right hon. Colleague in the representation of Oxford assented to the Amendment; but, for his part, he could not give his assent to it, as it would overthrow existing arrangements between the University and the city of Oxford, under which the whole question of rating and expenditure was amicably and satisfactorily settled between the University and city of Oxford. He could not see why the Education Board should have the entire determination of the matter.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought, as the University was to contribute to the rate, it was only just that it should have its share of representation upon the school Board.

MR. W. E. FORSTER stated that the Amendment would place Oxford in precisely the same position as the other towns in the kingdom.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD AUGUSTUS HERVEY moved, Clause 92, at end add—

"Provided also, That no school in which the Holy Scriptures are not daily used shall be entitled to receive any Parliamentary Grant."

He held it to be of primary importance that religious instruction should be given in all schools. Religious instruction formed an essential part of education, and no education could be considered complete without religion, and Parliament ought not to sanction education which was not complete. In page 35, at the end of Clause 92, to add the words "Provided also, That no school in which the Holy Scriptures are not daily used shall be entitled to receive any Parliamentary grant."—
(Lord Augustus Hervey.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER begged to remind the noble Lord that this question had been already discussed and decided, and the general principle that religious might be combined with secular education, but that their union should not be compelled, had been approved on both sides of the House.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he entirely agreed in the doctrine of his noble Friend; and if he carried the question to a Division, he (Sir John Pakington) should vote with him. From the beginning to the end of the Bill there was not a word said on the subject of religion, except as to the formularies to be taught. He was of opinion that if they did not provide for the teaching and reading of the Holy Scriptures, it would be a great blot on the Bill.

MR. COLLINS said, that if this Amendment were carried, it would interfere with rate-created schools and voluntary schools.

MR. NEWDEGATE: The hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) is, I admit, always anxious to consult what may seem at the moment to be the convenience of the House, whether by counting out the House, or after any other fashion, and, at the present, he seems to think that it would be inconvenient to the House to consider the subject involved in the Motion which has been brought before us by the noble Lord the Member for Suffolk (Lord Augustus Hervey); but I differ from the hon. Member. I agree with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), who has just spoken; and I shall be curious to hear from the representatives of the Protestant Dissenters their reasons, should they think of rejecting the Motion of the noble Lord. The House divided:—Ayes 197; Noes 106: Majority 91.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, Second Schedule, page 37, line 10, after "provided that any poll shall be taken by Ballot," insert "in accordance with the principles upon which a poll is taken under 'The Metropolis Management Act, 1855.'"

Amendment proposed,

In the Second Schedule, page 37, line 10, after the words "provided that any poll shall be taken by ballot," to insert the words "in accordance with the principles upon which a poll is taken under 'The Metropolis Management Act, 1855.'"
—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had no wish to detain the House any longer, but he could not possibly allow the addition proposed by his right hon. Friend without a Division. As it was, however, so near 7 o'clock, he should move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was in hopes that his hon. Friend would have been contented with the discussion which they had had already on this question, or that he would have taken a Division so as to have allowed the Committee to dispose at once of this stage of the Bill. It was most important that this question should be completed in that House without any further delay. If his hon. Friend, however, insisted upon his Motion for the adjournment of the debate, he (Mr. Forster) should earnestly appeal to hon. Members who had Motions on the Paper for the Evening Sitting to allow this question to be resumed immediately upon their re-assembling at 9 o'clock.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT remarked that they had been 12 hours discussing this question with the hope of securing a real Ballot. The question now with the Liberal party was whether they would assent to accept what everyone knew was but a sham Ballot.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought there was no use in wasting any more time by adjourning this debate. It seemed to him that it would facilitate business if the hon. Member for Chelsea

(Sir Charles Dilke) would go to a Division at once upon this question.

LORD JOHN MANNERS reminded the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee of Council that some of the Members who had Notices on the Paper for the Evening Sitting were not present.

SIR CHARLES DILKE was appealed to to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate; but as he refused to do so,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would put the Bill upon the Paper after the other business, and would take his chance of bringing it on at any time.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The Clerk informed the House, That Mr. Speaker was prevented by indisposition from resuming the Chair this Evening.

Whereupon, Mr. Dodson, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PARLIAMENT—PROGRESS OF BUSINESS.

MR. BRUCE appealed to hon. Gentlemen who had Motions on the Paper to postpone them, so that the Report on the Education Bill might be finished that night. That measure was of the greatest importance, and it had received the support of both sides of the House. The Government had spared no efforts to pass it through its final stage; but they had failed to pass the Report at the Morning Sitting, and unless it could be done that night the third reading could not take place before Monday next, and it would not reach the House of Lords till that day. He, therefore, appealed to the kindness, and, indeed, to the patriotism of hon. Gentlemen to postpone the Motions that stood in their names.

MR. EYKYN, who had given Notice of a Motion on the Metropolitan Police Force, said, he regretted to find that both the Prime Minister and the Speaker were absent in consequence of the long and exhaustive Sitzings of the House. After the appeal of the Home Secretary, and in the hope that a Select Committee would be appointed early next Session to inquire into the constitution, &c., of the Metropolitan Police Force, he should withdraw his Motion.

MR. LEONARD EDMUNDS.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the arrest and detention in prison of Leonard Edmunds at the suit of the Crown; and to move for Papers, said, it was easy for the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Eykyn) to give way when the Government were ready to give him the Committee next Session for which he asked. He, however, stood in a different position, and there was the less necessity for him to give way, because the case he had to bring before the House would only occupy a very short time. It was known a short time ago as the "Edmunds' Scandal." The House was aware that there had been matters of litigation between Mr. Leonard Edmunds and the Government, who claimed a very considerable sum as having been received by Mr. Leonard Edmunds, and for which they contended he was liable. He disputed the liability, and made counter-claims against the Government. An information was laid by the Crown some years ago in the Court of Chancery, and the then Vice Chancellor Giffard gave a decision adverse to Mr. Edmunds in some points, and making him liable for certain sums, of which he directed that an account should be taken; but, in justice to Mr. Edmunds, he ought to state that he entirely and expressly acquitted Mr. Edmunds of all moral fault. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: The whole matter was not before the Court.] It was the duty of the Government to have laid the whole case before the Vice Chancellor, and if they failed to do so they were in fault, and they were not entitled now to make it a point against Mr. Edmunds. An account having been ordered to be taken, the whole matter was subsequently referred by counsel to two barristers, against Mr. Edmunds' expressed desire. Those barristers, who doubtless were gentlemen entitled to every confidence, ultimately decided, that Mr. Edmunds was indebted to the Crown in the sum of £7,000 odd, which, with a moiety of the costs of the reference, amounted altogether to about £8,100. That was in the month of November last year. Nothing further took place for a short time; but it happened that in consequence of a certain publication that had been made by two high officers of State Mr. Edmunds conceived that he had ground against them for an action for libel, in which the whole question between himself and the Crown would have been re-opened. Such was the position of the two parties, when in the spring of this year Mr. Edmunds was arrested for his debt to the Crown and thrown into prison, where he now remained. Now he, in common, he believed, with all hon. Members, at the time believed that by the Act of last year imprisonment for debt was abolished, except in the particular cases specified by the Act. The case of Mr. Edmunds came under none of them, yet in this instance the recovery of the debt he owed to the Crown had been pursued by the odious mode of imprisonment. He could not dispute the legality of the arrest, seeing that a very learned Judge had decided that it was legal; but he could easily have understood that another view of the matter might have been taken. He was bound to assume that the Crown had the legal right of imprisonment. But then it was a different thing to determine whether it was right to exercise that right. He trusted the House would consider how the question stood. It was distinctly stated by Vice Chancellor Giffard that there was in the case no moral fraud; that it was a mere question of debt; that there was no violation of trust, no retaining of money in his hands which he was unwilling to pay over, nor anything for which the penalty was prescribed by Act of Parliament. That being so, how was Mr. Edmunds placed? As far as he was concerned, unless the special mercy of the Crown was shown to him—and very little mercy had been shown to him hitherto—he would be imprisoned for the term of his natural life. Formerly, a man had the power to relieve himself from this position by becoming bankrupt. But that was the case no longer. He might give up every farthing he possessed; but unless he gave up £8,000 odd, he must remain a prisoner for the term of his natural life. Was that a position which Parliament contemplated when it abolished imprisonment for debt? If such a thing had

Mr. NEWDEGATE: The hon. tion in the religion of the Tycoon, or in that of Confucius. I do not believe that it means education in any of the Pantheistic or Polytheistic religions of the ancients; and I think there is a distinct object to be attained by ascertaining what the House really does mean by religious education. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), whom I see opposite to me, will agree with me in this, although he is opposed to the teaching of any religion. I should be surprised if I were to hear the hon. Member rise in his place, and, as the representative of that great town, declare that his peculiar objection to religious education is because it is founded in the doctrines of the Bible. I do not believe that the hon. Member would make any such declaration as that. What, then, is the object of having this Amendment inserted in the Bill? To my mind that object is to define the religion that we contemplate; and I believe that we mean the religion contained in the Bible, which is common to every section of Christians. This is a distinct religion; a mere belief, which is indistinct, is not religion. Sir, I am quite willing that every denomination should put its own interpretation upon the religion derived from this standard. God forbid that I should support the insertion in the Bill of words which would have the effect of limiting that interpretation. Let the Unitarian, let the Presbyterian—in short, let every sect place its own interpretation on this religion; but let it be distinctly understood that what the Legislature means by the term “religious education,” is education in the doctrines of the Bible. Now, there is a great object to be obtained by this; for, if there is any public value in religion, it is that it affords a standard of morals. I hold that the State has no right to intrude into what the Roman Catholic theologians describe as the “Forum interius”—that the State has no right to force conscience; but that it has a right to enforce the observance of the rules of morality, which are embodied in its laws. The House will excuse me for expressing, in distinct terms, the general sense of the great body of Protestant Christians, when they desire that the State should not repudiate in any way the Bible, as containing the religion which the State recognizes, and of which this very Bill is intended to promote the inculcation, as part of the education to be supported out of the public Revenue. [“Divide!”] Why do you shrink from me? You cry “Divide!” because I am distinct; because, in giving my support to this Amendment, I would put my position clearly before the House. I say, that the value of religion to the State, and the only concern which the State, or this House, as part of the State, ought to have with religion, is on account of the morality of which it is the source and the foundation. Well, Sir, I hold that the morality of the Bible is perfectly distinct and admitted; and I have always thought that the denominational system of primary education, as originally established in this country, was established on a wise foundation, because the first grants were made in aid of the voluntary exertions, and in aid of the subscriptions, which were collected by the National Society, and the British and Foreign School Society, both societies being bound by their rules to inculcate a religious, a Scriptural education. That was, and is, the rule; and then came the exceptions. First, the Jews came to Parliament and said—“We can only accept and teach one-half the Bible;” and the State, having considered their claim, said—“Consistently with our abstinence for making inquiries into conscientious objections, provided our standard be not violated by the rejection of the Bible, we will make an exception in your favour.” The State, therefore, made a grant in favour of the Jews, but upon the understanding that they did not reject the Bible. Next came the Roman Catholics; the Roman Catholics equally claimed a share in the grant of public money on this ground—that they do not reject the Bible, although the Roman Catholic priesthood claim, according to the present practice of their Church, a monopoly for their own order not only in the teaching, but in the study of the Bible, and refuse it to the laity. This claim gave rise to a great difficulty in this House, but the House was lenient, and again made an exception. [“Question!”] Why this is distinctly the question. I am showing the House that the system which exists in this country is founded on a Scriptural basis, and that there are two great exceptions to it—the first made in deference to the consciences of the Jews; the second in deference to the application of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. [“Divide!”] Hon. Gentlemen will excuse me, but I feel that I am in the performance of my duty as a Member of this House in speaking distinctly of the matter before you. The exception, which was made at the instance of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, was still made only upon the ground that, although the priesthood claimed a monopoly in the study and teaching of the Bible and in teaching from the Bible, they did not reject the Bible; and, Sir, I do trust that the Legislature will not finally depart from the rule to which it has hitherto adhered, that whenever it grants public money in support of an education which it terms "religious," it intends to define the religion which it means by rendering the acceptance of the Bible the foundation of the grant. ["Divide!"] I know there are hon. Members who wish to shirk this question; but now, that it has been distinctly raised, I claim to put it plainly before the House. Allow me to advert for a moment to those who object on the score that children are incapable of understanding the Bible. Sir, the practice of the Christian world for centuries has confuted that assertion, and I put it to every man who recollects his early education, whether the maxims and texts from the Holy Scriptures which he learnt in childhood are not so deeply engraven on his memory that in times of trouble these texts and maxims come up in his mind readily to his relief. Sir, it amounts to the manifestation of a total ignorance of human nature, of an utter inexperience in education; it argues a complete disregard for the fundamental principles on which this commonwealth is regulated, to say that the Bible and its teaching has not been accepted for centuries, not only as the foundation of the education of the children of England, but of the laws which are to regulate their conduct in after-life. I claim this sanction. ["Oh!"] Yes, hon. Members opposite are much afraid of this question. They dislike that which is definite. Yet this has been my strength in public life, that I have always taken up a position which everyone could understand. Whether they approved or whether they disapproved of it, they have clearly understood what I meant; such ought to be the strength of this House, and I trust that the House of Commons will distinctly manifest its intention, proclaiming that its understanding of the term "religious education" is, as it has been, an education consistent with and embodying the religion of the Bible.

The House divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 205: Majority 116.

LORD JOHN MANNERS moved, Second Schedule, First Part, paragraph 1, lines 9 and 10, leave out "provided that any poll shall be taken by Ballot." He said that neither the arguments which were used in the former debate, nor the Divisions which then were taken, had in the least degree qualified the opinion he then expressed respecting the proposal of the Government; and he asked the House to consider the mode in which it was recommended to their acceptance. In the first place, it was said that there was an Act of Will. IV. which had never come into practical operation, but which gave some kind of legislative sanction for the introduction of the Ballot; and, secondly, it was urged that under the operation of the Local Management Act the Ballot was used in the election of vestrymen in the metropolis. The Government, however, had now withdrawn both those arguments, for it was now provided that the Vice President should have the option of overriding every provision of the Local Management Act as far as the Ballot was concerned; though at that he was not surprised, for he was informed that the Ballot at the election of vestrymen was a nullity. The Government now asked the House to give autocratic power to a Department of the State to cause some undisclosed system to be adopted in every borough and school district. He contended that the proposal was not made either at the right time or in the proper place, for it was now impossible that either this House or the other could fairly discuss so grave and momentous a proposal at the fag-end of the Bill and so late in the Session; and, therefore, in the interest of the Ballot itself, the House ought to object to the proposal. On those grounds he moved the omission of the words.

Amendment proposed, in the Second Schedule, page 37, lines 9 and 10, to leave out the words "Provided that any poll shall be taken by ballot."—(Lord John Manners.)

The House divided:—Ayes 197; Noes 106: Majority 91.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, Second Schedule, page 37, line 10, after "provided that any poll shall be taken by Ballot," insert "in accordance with the principles upon which a poll is taken under 'The Metropolis Management Act, 1855.'"

Amendment proposed,

In the Second Schedule, page 37, line 10, after the words "provided that any poll shall be taken by ballot," to insert the words "in accordance with the principles upon which a poll is taken under 'The Metropolis Management Act, 1855.'"
—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had no wish to detain the House any longer, but he could not possibly allow the addition proposed by his right hon. Friend without a Division. As it was, however, so near 7 o'clock, he should move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was in hopes that his hon. Friend would have been contented with the discussion which they had had already on this question, or that he would have taken a Division so as to have allowed the Committee to dispose at once of this stage of the Bill. It was most important that this question should be completed in that House without any further delay. If his hon. Friend, however, insisted upon his Motion for the adjournment of the debate, he (Mr. Forster) should earnestly appeal to hon. Members who had Motions on the Paper for the Evening Sitting to allow this question to be resumed immediately upon their re-assembling at 9 o'clock.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT remarked that they had been 12 hours discussing this question with the hope of securing a real Ballot. The question now with the Liberal party was whether they would assent to accept what everyone knew was but a sham Ballot.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought there was no use in wasting any more time by adjourning this debate. It seemed to him that it would facilitate business if the hon. Member for Chelsea

(Sir Charles Dilke) would go to a Division at once upon this question.

LORD JOHN MANNERS reminded the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee of Council that some of the Members who had Notices on the Paper for the Evening Sitting were not present.

SIR CHARLES DILKE was appealed to to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate; but as he refused to do so,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would put the Bill upon the Paper after the other business, and would take his chance of bringing it on at any time.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The Clerk informed the House, That Mr. Speaker was prevented by indisposition from resuming the Chair this Evening.

Whereupon, Mr. Dodson, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PARLIAMENT—PROGRESS OF BUSINESS.

MR. BRUCE appealed to hon. Gentlemen who had Motions on the Paper to postpone them, so that the Report on the Education Bill might be finished that night. That measure was of the greatest importance, and it had received the support of both sides of the House. The Government had spared no efforts to pass it through its final stage; but they had failed to pass the Report at the Morning Sitting, and unless it could be done that night the third reading could not take place before Monday next, and it would not reach the House of Lords till that day. He, therefore, appealed to the kindness, and, indeed, to the patriotism of hon. Gentlemen to postpone the Motions that stood in their names.

MR. EYKYN, who had given Notice of a Motion on the Metropolitan Police Force, said, he regretted to find that both the Prime Minister and the Speaker were absent in consequence of the long and exhaustive Sittings of the House. After the appeal of the Home Secretary, and in the hope that a Select Committee would be appointed early next Session to inquire into the constitution, &c., of the Metropolitan Police Force, he should withdraw his Motion.

MR. LEONARD EDMUNDS.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the arrest and detention in prison of Leonard Edmunds at the suit of the Crown; and to move for Papers, said, it was easy for the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Eykyn) to give way when the Government were ready to give him the Committee next Session for which he asked. He, however, stood in a different position, and there was the less necessity for him to give way, because the case he had to bring before the House would only occupy a very short time. It was known a short time ago as the "Edmunds' Scandal." The House was aware that there had been matters of litigation between Mr. Leonard Edmunds and the Government, who claimed a very considerable sum as having been received by Mr. Leonard Edmunds, and for which they contended he was liable. He disputed the liability, and made counter-claims against the Government. An information was laid by the Crown some years ago in the Court of Chancery, and the then Vice Chancellor Giffard gave a decision adverse to Mr. Edmunds in some points, and making him liable for certain sums, of which he directed that an account should be taken; but, in justice to Mr. Edmunds, he ought to state that he entirely and expressly acquitted Mr. Edmunds of all moral fault. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: The whole matter was not before the Court.] It was the duty of the Government to have laid the whole case before the Vice Chancellor, and if they failed to do so they were in fault, and they were not entitled now to make it a point against Mr. Edmunds. An account having been ordered to be taken, the whole matter was subsequently referred by counsel to two barristers, against Mr. Edmunds' expressed desire. Those barristers, who doubtless were gentlemen entitled to every confidence, ultimately decided, that Mr. Edmunds was indebted to the Crown in the sum of £7,000 odd, which, with a moiety of the costs of the reference, amounted altogether to about £8,100. That was in the month of November last year. Nothing further took place for a short time; but it happened that in consequence of a certain publication that had been made by two high officers of State Mr. Edmunds conceived that he had ground against them for an action for libel, in which the whole question between himself and the Crown would have been re-opened. Such was the position of the two parties, when in the spring of this year Mr. Edmunds was arrested for his debt to the Crown and thrown into prison, where he now remained. Now he, in common, he believed, with all hon. Members, at the time believed that by the Act of last year imprisonment for debt was abolished, except in the particular cases specified by the Act. The case of Mr. Edmunds came under none of them, yet in this instance the recovery of the debt he owed to the Crown had been pursued by the odious mode of imprisonment. He could not dispute the legality of the arrest, seeing that a very learned Judge had decided that it was legal; but he could easily have understood that another view of the matter might have been taken. He was bound to assume that the Crown had the legal right of imprisonment. But then it was a different thing to determine whether it was right to exercise that right. He trusted the House would consider how the question stood. It was distinctly stated by Vice Chancellor Giffard that there was in the case no moral fraud; that it was a mere question of debt; that there was no violation of trust, no retaining of money in his hands which he was unwilling to pay over, nor anything for which the penalty was prescribed by Act of Parliament. That being so, how was Mr. Edmunds placed? As far as he was concerned, unless the special mercy of the Crown was shown to him—and very little mercy had been shown to him hitherto—he would be imprisoned for the term of his natural life. Formerly, a man had the power to relieve himself from this position by becoming bankrupt. But that was the case no longer. He might give up every farthing he possessed; but unless he gave up £8,000 odd, he must remain a prisoner for the term of his natural life. Was that a position which Parliament contemplated when it abolished imprisonment for debt? If such a thing had then been mentioned on the floor of this House he was sure that a special provision would have been introduced to meet it. This was a casus omissus, and the Crown had taken advantage of it. This, then, was the position in which Mr. Edmunds was placed; and he called the attention of the House to the fact that when they all believed that imprisonment for debt had been altogether abolished, it was still continued in this odious form. Under these circumstances, he had thought it right to bring the matter before the House. It might be asked, why he did not come forward and propose an alteration in the law? But he need not tell the House that it would be idle for a private Member to attempt an alteration of the law at this period of the Session. But it was a question for the House, and still more for the Government, to consider whether it was right and fitting that the name of the Sovereign should be introduced into an Act of this sort; that when it was agreed that all others should be deprived of the right of imprisonment, the Sovereign, and she alone, should have this odious power, which was condemned by the good feeling of the House and the country? He begged to move—

"That there be laid before this House, a Copy of any Warrant or Order of Court for the commitment to prison of Leonard Edmunds at the suit of the Crown."

SIR JOHN HAY seconded the Motion.

MR. WEST said, he was astonished, that the well-known principle of law, "That the Crown was not bound by an Act of Parliament, unless specially named," should have been described by a lawyer to be "an old doctrine recently revived by the Law Officers of the Crown." The doctrine was as old as the existence of law in this country; it was still acted upon every day. His right hon. and learned Friend seemed to forget that the Prerogatives of the Crown, however they might be exercised in former days for the personal benefit of the Crown, were now only exercised for the benefit of the public, and had, in fact, become part of the rights of the nation. He dissented altogether from the proposition of his right hon. and learned Friend when he said that, if before the passing of the Act the attention of the House had been called to the matter, provision would have been made for the abolition of the rights of the Crown. He would only say that if this had been so his voice would have been raised to protect the rights of the Crown, which he held to be of the highest importance to the welfare of the nation; for it was the nation, and not the Crown, that was concerned in the matter. He would not go into this miserable case of Mr. Edmunds; but he hoped that the Law Officers as long as the law existed would enforce it. If a wretched boy robbed his master's till of 1s. 6d., he was sent to prison; but if a public servant deprived the Exchequer of some thousands of pounds a morbid sympathy was raised for him, and an outcry was raised if he were dealt with according to law. His fear, on the contrary, was lest the Law Officers of the Crown should exercise the Prerogatives of the Crown with too gentle a hand. He would remind the House that there was a great distinction between the Crown and private debtors. An ordinary tradesman could sell his goods to whom he chose; but the Crown had no such choice. Its debts were contracted not by the choice of the Crown, and how was the Crown to recover the taxes from its debtors unless it had the power to enforce them? He hoped, therefore, the Crown would not give way upon this case. If the law was to be altered, let it be altered. But as long as it continued to exist it was the duty of the Law Officers to enforce it.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he had no intention of entering upon the legal argument, for which he felt himself utterly incompetent; but in consequence of the virtuous indignation into which the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had worked himself, he rose to ask the House to consider what the world at large were likely to say of the matter. He believed the world would consider that the rights of the Crown had little or nothing to do with it. They would look upon the Crown on one side, and Mr. Edmunds on the other, as two parties to a civil action which had been left to arbitration. It was not the case of a defaulting taxpayer, nor that of a defaulting officer of Inland Revenue. The facts of the case were that a suit between the parties had long been going on — between Mr. Edmunds and the Crown—and in the end a decision was given for the Crown. Hereupon the Lords of the Treasury issued a Minute which laid them open to a charge of libel. The action for libel was commenced, when it was stopped by the arrest of Mr. Edmunds. Now, would not the world say that this was an improper position for the high Officers of the Crown to place themselves in—that it was an unfortunate position for the Crown, and one to which it ought not to have been committed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must express his great surprise at the speech of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Russell Gurney). The way in which the Law Officers viewed the matter was this—that Mr. Edmunds was a defaulter to the Crown in respect of moneys which he had received, and which he was bound to pay over to the Exchequer. His distinct duty was prescribed to him by Act of Parliament, and therefore he could not concur with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) that his case was different from that of a defaulting taxpayer or defaulting collector of Inland Revenue. Mr. Edmunds had received money due to the Crown, and he had not paid it over, as it was his duty to do. But he was at a loss to understand the argument of his right hon. and learned Friend who introduced this Motion. He admitted that Mr. Edmunds had received £7,000 which he was bound to pay. He admitted that the Crown had a right to issue process against Mr. Edmunds' person. One of the highest authorities on the Bench, Mr. Justice Willes, entertained no doubt that the Crown had a right to adopt the proceedings that had been taken. If Mr. Edmunds had thought fit to appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Willes he might have done so. His right hon. and learned Friend said that the Act of last Session was misunderstood. With great respect to his right hon. and learned Friend he must characterize that as a rather bold assertion. For himself, he must say he thought he understood it. Could anyone doubt that the Lord Chancellor and the Law Lords in the other House who passed it understood it? If his right hon. and learned Friend rose and said he did not understand it he would give implicit credence to that statement, however it might surprise him; but he believed the Solicitor General and all the other lawyers in the House understood it in the sense he did. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency

Acts of previous years had not interfered with the rights of the Crown, though certain of them had all but abolished imprisonment for debt in the case of debts due to ordinary creditors. Neither had the Act of last Session been intended to do away with the Prerogatives of the Crown in the case of defrauding debtors. When he spoke of the rights of the Crown in such matters he spoke of rights exercised for the benefit of the people. He thought his right hon. and learned Friend was entirely mistaken when he endeavoured to make out that it was the intention of the Legislature last Session to repeal the power of imprisonment for debt on the part of the collective community as represented by the Crown. In the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of last Session, passed within a week or two of the Act to which his right hon. and learned Friend had referred, there was a provision to the effect that where a sufficient distress could not be found, in every such case any two of the Commissioners were thereby authorized, by warrant under their hands, to commit the defaulter to the common gaol or House of Correction of the place where he was arrested, there to be kept until payment was made or until he should be released by order of the said Commissioners. This was an extension of the power of imprisonment for debt on the part of the Crown. If his right hon. and learned Friend then held the opinion he now appeared to do, it was astonishing that he did not object then to that provision. For himself, he was not much attached to imprisonment for debt, and would be thankful to see it abolished; but he had made inquiries of the Solicitor to the Inland Revenue Board, who told him that, in his opinion, it would be impossible to abolish imprisonment for debt in the case of persons who owed taxes, or of collectors who did not pay them over, and he also found that that Department and the Treasury, and all the Courts, had acted on the supposition that the Act of last Session did not apply to debts due to the Crown. In January, February, March, April, May, and June last a number of warrants and executions for non-payment of taxes and other debts due to the Crown were issued against the person, and the effect of those executions was that the debts were paid. There might be reasons why, as between subject and subject, the Legislature should abolish it; but nobody, he thought, would deny that imprisonment for debt was the most effectual of remedies. Several persons had been imprisoned since that Act was passed, and they had paid the debt; and he found there was one man in prison now for a comparatively small debt. Why were they to have all that sympathy for a great debtor and none for the small debtor? The question before the House was whether imprisonment for debt at the suit of the Crown should be altogether abolished. If so, the thing ought to be done by a well-considered Act of Parliament, and not by a Motion of that kind brought on at the end of the Session. They could not say that this remedy of the Crown, being enforced against other persons, it ought not to be enforced against Mr. Edmunds, although that would appear to be the effect of the Motion. He had no desire to enter into the merits of the case; but as his right hon. and learned Friend had done so, and Mr. Edmunds had circulated a large number of pamphlets calculated to mislead hon. Members—one-half of which might be described as consisting of misstatements in his own favour, and the other half of libels on other people—he thought it necessary to say a few words as to the real state of the case. He considered this an exceptional case, and believed that if there was anyone Crown debtor against whom it was necessary to issue execution it was Mr. Edmunds. Mr. Edmunds was appointed Clerk of the Patents in 1833 by Lord Brougham, and then the salary of the office was £400 a year. Mr. Edmunds' own account of the matter was that he accepted the office on the understanding that he was to receive £100, and pay the rest of the salary over to the Brougham family. It was not necessary for him to investigate whether that statement was true or not. If it was true, Mr. Edmunds, by his own showing, entered into a corrupt bargain, whereby he became the conduit pipe for clandestinely conveying the public money to persons who had no right to it. Mr. Edmunds, it appeared, did none of the duties of the office, but appointed a person named Ruscoe to perform the duties, which he did for a number of years. Ruscoe received nothing from Mr. Edmunds, but earned a precarious subsistence by small fees received from patentees, selling patent boxes, and buying stamps for patentees at wholesale prices, and selling them at retail prices and pocketing the difference. This trade in stamps subsequently became very profitable, and at length it was clearly made out that Mr. Edmunds took a sum of £500 of public moneys, which it was his duty, as he perfectly well knew, to pay into the Exchequer, and applied it in the purchase of stamps wholesale, which stamps he sold by retail, and thus he went on trading from year to year with that £500 of the public money, and making a large profit, which, in addition to the emoluments of his office, he put into his own pocket. But the case did not stop there. For some years he paid over the moneys he received to the Exchequer. It was his duty, by the Act under which he was appointed, to pay them over quarterly, and make a declaration that he had so paid them, which he did for some time. After a time he intermitted those payments; instead of making them quarterly he did it half-yearly, then yearly; and, as nobody found it out, he kept the sums in his possession for two years; and, finally, there being nobody to check those irregularities, he ceased making any payments at all. And from the year 1852 to the period when he was found out he put all that money, which he was bound to pay into the Exchequer, into his own pocket. Now, how was he found out? Quite accidentally. Mr. Edmunds, having a violent temper, quarrelled with Mr. Woodcroft, who did all the work of the office, and brought various charges against him, which turned out to be unfounded. Mr. Woodcroft did not then know of Mr. Edmunds' malversation, but made counter charges against him only of negligence and remissness in his duties. The subject came before the Commissioners of Patents, among whom were his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and himself, and it was thought desirable to refer the whole matter with respect to the Patent Office to two gentlemen of the highest possible character—Mr. Greenwood and Mr. Hindmarch. The arbitrators took great pains with the case—they examined into the matter carefully, and they had Mr. Edmunds before them. In the course of their investigation they expressed a desire to see the accounts, and they asked Mr. Edmunds for his pass-book. He was very unwilling to produce it; but the more unwillingness he displayed the more determination they manifested to get possession of it. Each time that they asked for the book he made excuses for not producing it, such as he had lost it, and the like. Finally, the arbitrators threatened that unless he gave it up they would apply to the Bank for a copy, and under terror of this threat the book was produced. From this book the arbitrators found that from the year 1852 Mr. Edmunds had never paid in one farthing to the public account. Now, what was his first account of the transaction—because in matters of this sort it was extremely important to ascertain the first story told by the individual whose conduct was implicated. It appeared from the Blue Book upon the subject that Mr. Edmunds had handed a paper across the table to Mr. Greenwood, admitting the wrong in relation to the non-payment with sorrow, and that was the only explanation of the matter the arbitrators could obtain from him. Eventually, the arbitrators found that Mr. Edmunds owed the Exchequer a sum of between £3,000 and £4,000; but before that decision was announced Mr. Edmunds paid into the Treasury the sum of £7,000, for which, fortunately for him, he obtained a receipt. He said fortunately, because the then Law Officers, after some hesitation, came to the conclusion that as the Treasury had chosen to treat him as a debtor, it was not, on the whole, expedient to prosecute him as a criminal. He referred to this matter to show that Mr. Edmunds, so far from having been hardly dealt with, had all along been treated with much leniency. But this was not the termination of the affair. Mr. Edmunds had been a pluralist. He had held, besides his other appointment, the Clerkship to the House of Lords, and the matter was investigated by a Committee of that House, among the members of which were the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Derby, the Duke of Montrose, the Earl of Clarendon, and Lord Chelmsford, before whom he was cited, and personally called to give evidence. He admitted then that he had unfortunately omitted to pay a certain sum of money into the Consolidated Fund in the year 1852, and that he had also failed to do the like thing in the year following. Having missed two years, he said that he became alarmed, and was afraid to pay the money into the Exchequer the third year lest the whole of his accounts for 20 years previously should be audited. Each year, he declared, the difficulty of paying up the arrears became greater and he consequently allowed them to run on. There were many hon. and learned Members in that House who had prosecuted clerks for embezzlement, and they knew that the usual course of defence was, that having once omitted to make a payment they were afraid of making subsequent payments. The matter having been carefully considered by the Committee of the House of Lords, their Lordships came to the unanimous conclusion, among other things, that he was guilty of retaining in his own hands sums of money that ought to have been paid into the Exchequer, and that he had appropriated to his own private use various sums that belonged to the public. The Crown subsequently instituted proceedings in the Court of Chancery with reference to some other matters; and, with all respect to the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Russell Gurney), he must state that only part of the case was tried before the Vice Chancellor. Upon the evidence that was laid before him, the Vice Chancellor decided against Mr. Edmunds, but observed, at the same time, that there was no charge against his moral character. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen might cry "Hear, hear!" but the Vice Chancellor had not the whole case before him, the misappropriation of the £7,000 under the circumstances he had stated was not referred to on the part of the Crown. He (the Attorney General) was bound to state, however, that he had in his possession a letter from Vice Chancellor Giffard, which he was willing to show to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, or to any other hon. Member opposite, informing Mr. Greenwood that had he known the whole facts of the case the observation with respect to Mr. Edmunds' character would not have fallen from him.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY remarked that the letter to which the Attorney General referred was probably written by the Vice Chancellor, after hearing a one-sided statement.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was willing to show the letter to which he had alluded to any hon. Member who might desire to see it. It was very unfortunate for Mr. Edmunds that the Vice Chancellor had made the complimentary remark to which he had referred, because it had encouraged him to proceed with an action he had brought against Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, and to make extravagant demands against the Crown. Thereafter the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite agreed to refer all matters in dispute between Mr. Edmunds and the Crown to arbitrators. [Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY: No, no!] He maintained that such was the case. He had been engaged in the case from the beginning, and knew all the facts. On behalf of Mr. Edmunds it was demanded that all his claims—legal, equitable, and moral—should be referred to arbitration. It was at first objected to on the part of the Crown to arbitrate upon his moral claims; but latterly they agreed even to include these claims. The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman), and Mr. Pollock—a counsel of great eminence—were appointed to arbitrate, Mr. Manisty acting as umpire. They were engaged 11 days in hearing the case, two or three being occupied by Mr. Edmunds himself, and they came to an agreement without calling in the umpire.

MR. DENMAN said, he wished to state that he and Mr. Pollock took especial pains to have it understood that they were not arbitrators either for the Crown or for Mr. Edmunds, but they entered into the case quite irrespective of persons.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not question that both the learned gentlemen were impartial. They agreed that a sum of over £8,000 was still due from Mr. Edmunds to the Crown in respect of money which he was bound to pay over, but had retained in his possession, and had put some of it out to interest for a number of years, and some of which he had used for the purpose of carrying on the trade in stamps. Mr. Edmunds had then the courage to assert that he retained that money purposely and advisedly, because he had applied once or twice to the Treasury for an audit but could not obtain one, and when asked to whom he applied he named two gentlemen, both of whom were dead, one of whom was Mr. James Wilson, the Secretary to the Treasury. No letters however, could be found making such application. Mr. Edmunds also said he told Mr. Wilson that he had several thousands of pounds in hand, which he desired to pay over on his accounts being audited, and he added that on hearing his statement Mr. Wilson shrugged his shoulders and said nothing; he would leave anybody who knew the late Mr. James Wilson to judge whether he was the man, in hearing that money was due to the Treasury, to say no more about it. If Mr. Edmunds had hinted anything of the kind he would have had a Treasury letter the next morning. According to Mr. Edmunds' own account what he desired was an efficient audit. Well, Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch were appointed for the purpose of investigating the whole question. Yet they found the greatest difficulty in getting at the whole facts, and only learned them from Mr. Edmunds under the influence of a threat. If ever the right of the Crown against the person was to be enforced, it surely should be enforced against Mr. Edmunds. How could this Prerogative of the Crown be enforced against small debtors if it was allowed to lie in abeyance in the case of the greatest Crown debtor of the century? If the House wished to repeal the power of the Crown to apply a summary process against any debtor, a Bill ought to be introduced in order that the matter might be thoroughly discussed; but as that power still existed the Treasury would have failed in its duty if it had not applied it to the case of Mr. Edmunds. Had the Crown treated him as a bankrupt Mr. Edmunds would not have been better off, for the Court of Bankruptcy might have dealt with him as a fraudulent debtor, in which case he would have been liable to imprisonment. He left the case in the hands of the House, submitting that they could not come to the conclusion that the Treasury had done wrong in this matter.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Russell Gurney) had opened the case as shortly as possible, while the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had gone into the case elaborately, arguing it as a counsel engaged on the other side against Mr. Edmunds, and the only thing he had proved—if he had proved anything—was that he himself had compromised a felony. The question was not whether the Crown had the right of imprisoning for debt or not, but whether the course pursued towards Mr. Edmunds was, on any ground whatever, justifiable. He (Sir James Elphinstone) had known Mr. Edmunds for 31 years, and he did not believe he was a fraudulent debtor. On the contrary, he agreed with the judgment of Lord Justice Giffard, and was of opinion that Mr. Edmunds was an innocent man. He therefore asked the House and the country whether it was right and becoming that the power of the Crown should be exercised to crush this unfortunate man? Here was a man who, at the cost of thousands of pounds, had defended himself against the vilest charges, and now, at the age of 69 years and five months, he was in prison, and was left there to die, and if he did die they knew where his blood would rest. ["Oh!"] Yes, he was near his three score years and ten, the period allotted to man. Although the decision against him was given last November, Mr. Edmunds was allowed to be free until he had brought an action against certain high officers. The moment it became clear that an action would be brought steps were at once taken to make it a remanet, and Mr. Edmunds was persuaded to postpone his action by means which were scarcely creditable. Three weeks ago Mr. Brutton waited on him (Sir James Elphinstone) just before he had started for a Committee of that House. He told him he came from Mr. Bradley, the Solicitor to the Treasury, for the purpose of negotiating Mr. Edmunds' release. He (Sir James Elphinstone) told Mr. Brutton that Mr. Edmunds ought not to consent to postpone the trial unless he first obtained his freedom; but he, at the same time, added that if Mr. Edmunds had an honourable understanding with the Treasury he would advise him to postpone his action, as it was a most inconvenient time for prominent Members of the Government to be asked to engage in such a matter. He wrote a note to the effect to Mr. Edmunds. Well, this gentleman, who represented that he was set in motion by the Treasury, went to Mr. Edmunds, in Whitecross Street Prison, and repeated his statement in the presence of Mr. Bernardo Shiel, who happened to be visiting Mr. Edmunds at the time. Mr. Edmunds said to Mr. Brutton—"I will not give the required consent for the remanet unless I receive a quid pro quo. I require an exchange of papers—the consent on the one hand, the unconditional discharge from prison on the other." Mr. Edmunds spoke roughly and in the most decided manner. Mr. Brutton said that could not be done, as there were some red-tape formalities to be gone through, adding that his only object was to help him through his difficulties. If these persons were summoned to the Bar of the House they would prove the correctness of what he had just stated. Mr. Edmunds would never have given up the lever he had over the Government, only for certain promises held out to him; and now having been induced to withdraw by some means or other, the unfortunate man was to be kept in prison until next December. It was the opinion of his medical advisers that this would be most injurious if not fatal to his health. Sir William Ferguson, on the 4th of July, said he had just seen Mr. Edmunds in Whitecross Street Prison; that he had been in the habit of attending him for 20 years, that he had lately had an attack of erysipelas, that he had been always accustomed to bracing exercise in the open air, and that a long detention in prison would seriously affect his health. Dr. Waters also stated that he had been struck by the altered appearance of Mr. Edmunds, which he could only attribute to his present confinement. The case, if he was spared, would come before a jury of his countrymen in December, and then he would obtain that verdict to which he had a right. If it was adverse his friends might desert him; but he (Sir James Elphinstone) never would.

MR. DENMAN said, he felt bound to take part in this debate after the remarks which had fallen from the Attorney General; but it would be, of course, unbecoming in him to adopt one side or the other as regarded voting upon the question. He had attended frequently in that House whenever that Motion was on the Paper, because he thought it would be a proper opportunity of answering a charge made against him by the hon. Baronet (Sir James Elphinstone), who, however, he was quite aware, knew nothing whatever about the legal bearings of the question. He and his brother arbitrator had been charged on an occasion when he was not in the House with having decided this case ex parte. Nothing could be more different from the fact than such a statement. When first appointed arbitrators, he, himself, and Mr. Pollock had distinctly given it to be understood that they only accepted the reference upon the understanding that they were to be joint arbitrators to all intents and purposes, and not the arbitrators of either party. They examined the evidence most carefully, and read all the Blue Books and documents which were prepared by both sides. They read those documents both during the hearing and afterwards, and they then met together to discuss the case, when they both took exactly the same general view of the case, and were of opinion that they could not do otherwise than make an award to the extent of over £7,000 against Mr. Edmunds. He ought, in justice to themselves, to say that the inquiry before the arbitrators was somewhat limited in its character though it was large in its scope. In the first place, they had, in accordance with the principle laid down by Vice Chancellor Giffard, as to the legality of certain transactions of Mr. Edmunds, to decide whether any money was due to the Crown, for the Vice Chancellor laid down a principle, according to which, if they found certain facts, Mr. Edmunds had no right to retain certain moneys, and by that principle they were bound. They also felt themselves almost bound not to award any costs against Mr. Edmunds, however much they might think he was in the wrong; because the Vice Chancellor had decided the question of costs in the Chancery suit not in Mr. Edmunds' favour, but still not against him, and they found themselves tied by the order of reference in that respect. Under the order of reference, they were empowered to say whether upon any moral grounds they recommended that Mr. Edmunds should be relieved from the payment of sums which might be actually due from him. In the sequel they did find that a larger amount than £7,000 was due from him; but they decided to advise the Crown to release him from the payment of a portion of the amount due. He wished to explain, however, that although they acted under that part of the order of reference which enabled them to recommend that Mr. Edmunds should be relieved from some portion of the strict claims against him on "moral grounds," they did not at all mean to say that any part of Mr. Edmunds' conduct was meritorious or honourable to him. The arbitrators found that during a certain period Mr. Edmunds had been receiving a less sum than he might have expected to receive, according to the original terms of his employment, and therefore they remitted a certain portion of the amount due from him. The award of the arbitrators was founded upon a belief that Mr. Edmunds, who ought to have paid very large sums to the Crown, had wilfully, and with a full knowledge that he was doing wrong, kept back that money for a great many years, and made a profit out of it on his own account. That was the basis of the award, and it was on that ground that the arbitrators decided against him. He could not, therefore, say he looked upon Mr. Edmunds as free from moral blame. He had heard the opinion of Vice Chancellor Giffard quoted more than once as though it were directly in the teeth of the opinions of the two Commissioners, Mr. Greenwood and Mr. Hindmarch, the opinion of the Committee of the House of Lords, and the opinions of the two arbitrators. But Vice Chancellor Giffard himself had told him (Mr. Denman), after the award was made, that he had not read the Blue Books on the subject when the case was argued before him, and that if he had read them at the time he should have come to a very different opinion, and would have abstained from expressing anything like an acquittal of Mr. Edmunds from moral blame in his judgment. That he could vouch for as having been said to him by Vice Chancellor Giffard. He gave this explanation because of the attacks which had been made upon him and his fellow-arbitrator not only in the course of this discussion, but in Mr. Edmunds' pamphlet, in which the arbitrators were falsely charged with having resolved to conclude the arbitration by a certain day, and decided the case ex parte against Mr. Edmunds, the charge being accompanied with the line—

"So wretches hang that jurymen may dine."

Whereas the matter had been most fully heard from beginning to end, and there was not a particle of foundation for any such statement.

DR. BALL said, that everyone who considered how unsuitable that House was for the discussion of legal questions must regret that a discussion of the nature of the present should have arisen. If legal questions demanded consideration, there were proper tribunals appointed by the Constitution for their decision. The bringing before that House in an indirect manner a charge against the execution of a law founded on an allegation of the illegality of the proceeding could have no justification, because if the commitment were illegal, the person arrested under it would be discharged from arrest. He, therefore, declined to give any support or assistance to any attempt here to impeach the proceedings, on the ground of illegality, or on the ground that a particular Act of Parliament was passed without its meaning or intention being understood. The law, as it existed, must be administered; and, if it were wrong, it must be altered by legislative interference, and not by indirect Motions or charges against the officers who were responsible to the public for its execution. Beside the objection that this was not the proper tribunal to decide, it appeared to him there also existed the objection to the discussion that it was most inexpedient. The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) who, the moment he was appointed an arbitrator, became a Judge and utterly ceased to have anything to do with the case, except as it lay within the record placed before him, whose mind should have been incapable of receiving an impression upon the case, except in his judicial capacity, and who ought not to have been as it were forced to come forward to express an opinion upon the matter, had been brought into examination, and obliged to give a history of his mode of reading the Papers in the case, and of his conferences with his brother arbitrator, and to reveal matters which would more wisely have been secluded within the sacred precincts of judicial investigation. The right hon. Gentleman (the Recorder of London) had made that House a tribunal for entering into the conduct of two men, whose position, honour, and reputation at the English Bar were quite sufficient to protect them, without having to come forward in any other way. He did not approve of the mode in which the question was brought forward; and he must say that he had not the remotest doubt as to the £7,000 being due, when he found it awarded by such men. Still it did not follow from that that he or any other Member of the House should be perfectly satisfied with the proceedings. When he came down to the House his impression was entirely in favour of the Crown; but the Attorney General had pointed out in his speech another mode of proceeding, which would have been much preferable to the one actually adopted, if it were open to the Executive—proceedings in bankruptcy.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not say that the Crown could have proceeded against Mr. Edmunds in bankruptcy; but that if they had been able to do so he did not think Mr. Edmunds would have fared better.

DR. BALL said, that he was not acquainted with the English bankruptcy laws, which were different from those in Ireland; but he must say that some such proceeding, if it could have been adopted, would have been preferable to one in which the Government made themselves the absolute masters and judges of the whole matter. Why had Parliament passed an Act which repealed the law for imprisoning a man for debt? Simply because it was not held right to imprison a man for a pecuniary demand. The tendency of the age was to abolish imprisonment except where there was a moral wrong in the case. But what had been done in this case? There was no finding of a moral wrong by any legal tribunal. Mr. Edmunds was arrested for £7,000, but it did not seem to have been considered what was to be done with him? Was there a period at which he could be discharged, or was it intended to detain him for life? for that was what the matter came to. The Government, when they took the step of arresting Mr. Edmunds, made themselves the judges of his misconduct or malversation. The Crown possessed a vast power in following and reaching goods which no private individual possessed; but instead of putting it in force in this case, Mr. Edmunds had been arrested, and the Government made themselves the judges as to his period of incarceration, for Mr. Edmunds could not take the benefit of the Insolvent Act. He had looked into such of the documents in the case as were before the House, and he found that Lord Justice Giffard in his judgment declared, as to some part of the case, that it arose from an unfortunate Act of Parliament passed in reference to a state of circumstances which changed immediately afterwards. And Lord Justice Giffard also judicially declared that the arguments and evidence placed before him had been successful in clearing the character of Mr. Edmunds from all imputations. That was the solemn judgment of a learned Judge; but the whole effect of it was to be frittered away by a letter not on sworn testimony, not after argument by counsel, not after all the advantages had been accorded which the law gave to every man who demanded inquiry, but on the private question and application of the Attorney General or of the arbitrators.

MR. DENMAN denied that he had ever said that it was upon his application that Vice Chancellor Giffard had made the observation he had quoted. It was a purely voluntary observation made by the Vice Chancellor to him.

DR. BALL said, that did not, in his opinion, make the least difference. It was an alarming principle that the decision of a Judge in his judicial capacity was to be frittered away by private conversations, because there was no case ever decided in which it might not be said that though the judgment pronounced on the Bench pronounced one thing, yet the conversation of the Judge afterwards over the dinner table asserted another. Mr. Edmunds got the office, as he understood the facts, with an agreement that the present Lord Brougham was to receive a proportion of the salary, and it was said that that noble Lord admitted that he had received £9,000 from the emoluments of the office while the whole salary was but £400 a year. Now was that office, or was it not, under the control of the Lord Chancellor, and ought not successive Lord Chancellors or Chancellors of the Exchequers to have kept their eyes upon it? Had there not been gross laches on the part of the Crown? Had not successive Governments given a sort of connivance to what had taken place by abstaining from interference? Then, he asked, was it not hard that the Government should suddenly turn round upon Mr. Edmunds and say—We will bring you to account. You have had £7,000 out of the office you had no right to; but we close our eyes to the fact that out of the income £9,000 has gone to Lord Brougham. Surely that was a matter to be inquired into; but Ille crucem tulit hic diadema. The condemnation fell upon Mr. Edmunds alone, although he had come under the notice of several Chancellors; and although the demand arose under an Act of Parliament, passed under different circumstances, and he was ordered to pay the whole as if it was a plain and simple transaction. It seemed to him that, unless no excuse could by possibility have been given for his conduct, and that it was plainly and undoubtedly morally wrong, the imprisonment of Mr. Edmunds was extremely harsh, and that every other means which could have been suggested ought to have been tried before this proceeding was taken. But, without any judicial condemnation of him as morally guilty, Government acted as judge and executioner in their own case.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, he thought it was rather unfortunate for Mr. Edmunds that his case had been brought before the House. Regular proceedings were instituted against him, and he defended them, and the result was that he was found to have incurred a very heavy debt to the Crown. The exculpation pronounced by the learned Judge was purely voluntary, and the last act of the Judge must be taken as explaining why he wished to retract what he had stated in his judgment. But again the matter was referred to the arbitration of two gentlemen of unimpeachable character, who went out of their way to say that not only legally, but morally, Mr. Edmunds was a debtor to the Crown in £7,000 or £8,000. The Crown had therefore no option but to proceed upon the decision, and all that could be said in mercy to Mr. Edmunds was that he had now no means to pay this debt, and was in his 69th year, and in bad health. There was no defence, and yet it was made an accusation against the Officers of the Crown that they had done their duty. The friends of Mr. Edmunds had injudiciously entered into details which would not bear investigation; whereas, if they had appealed ad misericordiam to the Crown, the circumstances of his present position might have been taken into consideration, and he (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) would then have been prepared, for one, to support the case. As it was, Mr. Edmunds had been imprisoned by his own default.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, nothing could be more disagreeable, or more opposed to the general rule on which he acted, than for him to take part in a debate relating to matters in which he had been officially or professionally concerned; but he felt that he should be doing some wrong to his hon. and learned Friend below him (the Attorney General), and those who shared with him in the responsibility of the Government, if he were to be entirely silent upon this occasion. He desired to remind the House that the proceedings against Mr. Edmunds were, as nearly as possible in substance, although not in form, taken under the direction of the House. There had been inquiries, and the results had been made public, and the matter had been carefully examined by a Committee of the House of Lords, who considered that he had been a defaulter in respect of public accounts committed to his care, out of which he was considered to have made illegitimate profit. Frequent questions were asked in that House, and pressure was put upon the Government of the day to compel them to take some effectual proceedings against Mr. Edmunds. It was considered most proper to adopt the civil form of procedure, as being that least accompanied with harshness, and a course which would enable the Crown to avoid, as far as possible, introducing any unnecessary imputations with regard to personal conduct. In the bill filed in Chancery the case was stated as drily as possible, the Officers of the Crown confining their statements to what was strictly necessary for the purpose of obtaining a decree for an account, the proper civil remedy. When the case came before the learned Judge, they directed their arguments—as they had also directed their evidence—to that point alone. Somewhat unexpectedly, though perhaps not unnaturally, the counsel for Mr. Edmunds went into those points of personal crimination which the Crown had abstained from touching. It was, therefore, almost inevitable that the learned Judge—whose name it was impossible to mention without a deep sense of the serious loss which the country had sustained by his death—should be induced to soften the decision upon the points of law which he felt compelled to pronounce by saying that, as the matter came before him, the explanations offered by Mr. Edmunds appeared to be such as might relieve his character from imputation, though insufficient to prevent a decree for an account being made against him. But it was a total misapprehension to suppose that the learned and excellent Judge was expressing, or could by any possibility have then given, a final opinion upon the real merits of the case, which were not, and could not be fully before him until the particulars and the general result of the account were seen. What was said on that occasion was quite consistent with the subsequent award. It would be an unfortunate circumstance if anything which might take place in the House should give countenance to the notion that persons intrusted with public money could be allowed to be so lax in their accounts as to have the opportunity of making use of any portion of the money for their private purposes. He trusted that nothing would be said or done in Parliament which might lead to the conclusion outside, especially among public officers, that the House looked upon matters of this kind more leniently and indulgently at the present time than it did in the year 1865.

MR. HORSMAN said, that he and Sir James Fergusson had been requested to look into this case. Subsequently it had been submitted to arbitration, and he would not have the presumption to question the judgment of the arbitrators. He did not, however, admit that the case before the House was simply that of the Crown and Mr. Edmunds. The question was not whether Mr. Edmunds had acted rightly or wrongly, but whether, imprisonment for debt having been done away with in civil cases, Mr. Edmunds, who had not been previously convicted as a fraudulent debtor, should be shut out from the benefit of that change in our law. Though four learned Gentlemen of great ability had addressed the House from the Government side, not one of them had applied himself to that point. It should be admitted that while the Government possessed this exceptional power they were bound to exercise it with great discretion, under great responsibility, and bearing in mind that they should give no occasion for any suspicion of animus in whatever they did. It was an unfortunate coincidence, calculated to produce a bad effect out-of-doors, that when Mr. Edmunds commenced an action for libel against the Treasury, at once the Treasury should have sought to incarcerate him. The public at large, not being as well informed on the matter as the House of Commons, might think that a cruel proceeding, though the House did not think so. They knew that the Attorney General and the Chancellor of the Exchequer divided between them the honour of Mr. Edmunds' incarceration, and they knew they were both humane men. The Attorney General was a man of great humanity, who would not tread upon a worm; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was well known to have the tenderest of hearts. It might truly be said of the right hon. Gentleman, as it had been said of Kirke White, that "he was not only overflowing with the milk of human kindness, but he monopolized the whole of the cream." What could they obtain from this shattered old man? He had been in possession of a valuable appointment. That was gone. He would have been entitled to a pension for long service. That was gone. He had occupied a good position in society. That was gone. He had had ample means of livelihood. They were gone. Even his health was shattered. How much lower was it necessary to bring him? They might take his life; but would there be any advantage to the public in that? The British public were in favour of justice to the fullest extent; but they abhorred anything like persecution. And he must express his own opinion that anything which had the semblance of persecution was a degradation to the position of the Law Officers, and to the Government under which they served. He did not see what public interest could be served by the incarceration of a poor, ruined, and borne-down man from whom nothing more could be obtained.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that if the Motion invited the House to pass almost a Vote of Censure upon the Law Officers of the Crown, he was sure the House would readily agree that a case had not been made out for any interference on the part of Parliament. He thought the House would rather concur in the opinion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Dr. Ball), in declaring that to bring to the Bar of the House of Commons questions of law, and to discuss them as political and even party questions, was a highly objectionable course. We had been told, on high authority, of the disadvantages which would arise if gentlemen holding high judicial positions were allowed to occupy seats in the House of Commons. He would not express any opinion on that as a general proposition; but if right hon. Members eminent in their judicial position, most eminent in their character, and most admired for their antecedents in that House, were to bring to the Bar of the House of Commons other Judges, and to almost impeach the legality of their proceedings, then one might be led to doubt whether the presence of other Judges in that Assembly would be an advantage. What had been done in this case? Here was a gentleman with whom the Government had nothing whatever to do. Mr. Edmunds was personally unknown to him. When he took Office he and his learned Friend the Attorney General found that proceedings had been instituted against Mr. Edmunds by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), and it was in progress when his hon. and learned Friend was in Office. The case was referred by the Treasury, at the earnest instance of Mr. Edmunds himself, to arbitration, and it was referred upon the principles laid down by Vice Chancellor Giffard, who carefully conducted the case so as not to raise moral questions. If Vice Chancellor Giffard gave a moral judgment it was an extra-judicial one, given for the purpose of making a disagreeable judgment as agreeable in manner as was possible. At the earnest instance of Mr. Edmunds, the case was referred to arbitrators, one of whom was chosen by himself and the other by the Government; and they decided that Mr. Edmunds, in addition to nearly £8,000 which he had paid over, under terror of exposure, was justly indebted to the Crown to the amount of nearly £8,000 more. When asked to make an explanation Mr. Edmunds conducted himself as a man who was guilty of malversation and paid over the £8,000. A suit was, therefore, instituted for the recovery of £7,000, and as Mr. Edmunds would not pay what else could they do? How could they avoid putting into execution the powers with which they were clothed? His right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Russell Gurney) must know that, although imprisonment for debt had been abolished, this did not hold good with regard to a debtor to the Crown. What argument against the exercise of this power was it to say that this gentleman was 70 years of age? With respect to the sarcasms thrown out by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Horsman) against his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, he (the Solicitor General) was quite ready to share the responsibility of sanctioning what had been done. The power in question was a most salutary power, and one without which it would be impossible to collect a large portion of the Revenue. He thought it right that, when a portion of the public money had been misapplied, extraordinary power should be exercised.

Mr. Hornerman

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he thought it necessary that he should say a few words in reply. He had been astonished to hear the hon. and learned Solicitor General say that he had been guilty of bringing the Judges to the Bar of that House. Anything more unlike the course he had really pursued than that statement could hardly be conceived. Not a single word had fallen from him that could bear the interpretation put upon his remarks by the Solicitor General. From the commencement to the end of his observations he had said he was not going into the merits of Mr. Edmunds' case. He had called attention to the only judicial judgment on record in the matter—namely, that of Vice Chancellor Giffard. The hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) said that information was filed in a way that would bring not the criminality, but the conduct of Mr. Edmunds before the Vice Chancellor; but the very things which had formed the substance of the Attorney General's speech were pressed by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond and Mr. Wickens before the Vice Chancellor, and having those matters before him the Vice Chancellor came to the decision which he had stated—namely, that there was no criminality, that it was a simple case of debtor and creditor, that Mr. Edmunds was legally liable, and that was all. He had brought that matter before the House, having been asked to do so, as an important constitutional question, and he had urged that at a time when the public believed, and the House believed, that imprisonment for debt was abolished, except in certain cases specified in the Act of Parliament, they found, in that which was declared by the only judicial decision upon the case to be a mere debt, the Crown was enforcing payment of the debt by the odious mode of imprisonment, which was condemned by the moral sense of the country. The speech of the Attorney General that night was a kind of rehearsal of the speech he would have to make next November, and it was scarcely becoming in the principal Law Officer of the Crown to make a strong ex parte speech in that House in respect to a case in which he was subsequently to appear before a jury. He had distinctly told the learned Attorney General beforehand that he was not going into the merits of the case, but simply into the question of imprisonment for debt. He had strictly followed that course, and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman had thought fit to enter into matters which were hardly becoming the position he occupied.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL rose to explain. [Loud cries of "Oh, oh!"]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Donson) ruled that the hon. and learned Attorney General might give an explanation of what he had said.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL wished to remark that he complained that his right hon. and learned Friend had said he would not go into the merits of the case, and then had proceeded to enter into them.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER also desired to explain. [Loud cries of "Divide!"]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Donson) ruled that the hon. and learned Gentleman might claim to speak in explanation.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, that his right hon. and learned Friend seemed to think that he had convicted him (Sir Roundell Palmer) of inconsistency when he referred to his argument before Vice Chancellor Giffard. What he had said was that he had not then gone into matters of a personal kind. The passage to which his right hon. and learned Friend referred simply stated the facts, which were necessary to entitle the Crown to the account which it sought and obtained, and which raised the questions of law, upon which the Judge decided that Mr. Edmunds was wrong.

Ordered, That there be laid before this House, a Copy of any Warrant or Order of Court for the commitment to prison of Leonard Edmunds at the suit of the Crown.—(Mr. Russell Gurney.)

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK.

THE SERPENTINE—RESOLUTION.

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR, in rising to call attention to the nature of certain works in progress at the Serpentine; and to move, "That, in the opinion of this House, the bed of the Serpentine, after being thoroughly cleared of mud, should be filled up so as to leave a maximum depth of six feet in the summer months, reducible to four feet in the winter months, with an easy slope from the banks, and an adequate supply of fresh water should be secured so as to cause, during the summer months, a constant outfall at the lower end," said, that for 20 years the state of that river had been a cause of public agitation, and 12 years ago £1,000 was voted for the purpose of carrying out a filtering scheme, though he had not been able to discover whether the process then suggested had ever been tried. Last October business-like preparations were made for altering the river according to popular requirements, and since then any inconvenience which had resulted from the works in progress had been cheerfully borne in the hope that the public would at last have a piece of water which would insure the health and safety of the large population which resorted to it. For some time past, however, that prospect had been fading away, and it was now found that the First Commissioner had no such boon in store, much disappointment being thereby caused in the public mind. As to the present plan, it had been deprecated without reference to party, and while he did not accuse the First Commissioner of having originated it, he thought the right hon. Gentleman could hardly complain of having to bear criticism since he had shown such a determination to accept the plan as his own. The Press assailed him, but found him indifferent; deputations waited upon him, but he seemed to think they would do better to mind their own business. It had, however, been recently ordered that the mud should be removed from a portion of the bed of the river, and for this concession he was grateful, as it would prevent pollution; but, as regarded the safety of human life, he contended that the scheme was worthless. There was a difference between what the public required and what the right hon. Gentleman was willing to do in order to render the Serpentine pure for bathers and safe for skaters. As to purity, the First Commissioner offered something which would not insure that condition unless provision was made for a frequent and regular supply of fresh water; while as to safety, the plan was such that only the ignorant or foolhardy would trust to it. In order to insure purity it was necessary that three things should be done—first, the bed of the river must be thoroughly cleansed from mud; secondly, the bed must be filled up to a certain extent with gravel or some other hard substance; and, thirdly, there must be a regular supply of fresh water to replace that which had been polluted by the bathers. But according to present arrangements there was no provision of that kind, though it might easily and cheaply be done by uniting the Round Pond at Kensington with the reservoir of the Grand Junction Water Works, which was distant only 1,200 yards. The most important of all the questions connected with the Serpentine was the safety of the public, and that could only be done by filling up the bed of the river to a reasonable depth. He admitted that that would be attended with expense; but he did not know how the public money could be expended better than for the safety of the public, while, when the outlay had been made a saving would be effected, for a shallow lake would not require so much water to be sent through it as a deep one would need. There was a certain proportion of bathers who could not swim, and another proportion who were not five feet high; and for these he should recommend an easier slope in the bank than one in six, for which his right hon. Friend conceived he had the authority of nature as exemplified at the sea shore. Further, in the interests of safety, he would suggest that a maximum depth of six feet in summer should be reduced to four feet in the winter months. He admitted that the suggestions he had made involved expenditure; but he denied that they involved extravagance. Further, he ventured to say that if this favourable opportunity were lost, if the works were completed according to the present plan, and the Serpentine left with a depth varying from 8 to 14 feet, the time would soon come, though not perhaps until the recurrence of some such awful catastrophe as that which happened in Regent's Park a few years ago, when a greater sacrifice of public convenience and public money would have to be made. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he had a similar Notice on the Paper; he would not, however, bring it forward, but would second the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend. He felt a certain diffidence in doing so on account of some remarks of the First Minister the other day, that he, a Member for the Isle of Wight, should speak on metropolitan improvements. He had to apologize for what he had done, having been 18 months out of Parliament; but as the right hon. Gentleman was not then present, he would not trouble the House with the few remarks which otherwise he should have made on the subject. He wished to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the matter before the House in the interest of economy, which he so ably represented. The first principle of economy was to do well what one had to do, and never to do what would have to be done over again. Some years ago £1,700 was spent upon the filtration of the water of the Serpentine, and that money had been entirely thrown away. Last year £13,000 had been expended on the works, and this year there was a Vote for £8,000 more, and if it ended there all that money would be thrown away also. He believed that the First Commissioner of Works was now willing to spend £5,000 more to get rid of the mud; but even that also would be thrown away as far as the interests of the public were concerned. He formed that opinion from the numerous letters he had seen on the subject. The proposed maximum depth of 14 feet would be much increased when the mud was all removed; but when that was done would the public be satisfied? It would not. It was impossible to suppose that there could be any safety to the people who bathed in the Serpentine if they had that depth of water. The Report of the Committee of 1861 recommended that measures should be taken to make the bed of the Serpentine clean and hard, that it should be covered with concrete and then with gravel, and that provision should be made for the safety of bathers and skaters. The sum they fixed on was £50,000, and they said that when a large sum of money was being spent the opportunity should be taken of beautifying the Serpentine. The present opportunity might be turned to account by the formation of islands, which would go far to beautify the water, and would enable the right hon. Gentleman to exercise his great powers of imagination and to put to good use the mud which at present he did not know how to get rid of. In 1868 there were half a million of bathers in the Serpentine; were they going to consult the interests of these people? The right hon. Gentleman had said the other day if they could not bathe there let them go elsewhere. Would the right hon. Gentleman say what he meant by that? Did he mean that they should bathe in the Thames? All he asked was that the public money should not be spent without anything satisfactory being done for it, for certainly it would be much better to spend £50,000 upon an admirable and beautiful work than to spend £26,000 without giving any satisfaction. This was a question of common sense—to know how the works might be executed efficiently. If they were to defeat the Government to-night on this point, they would be doing a good public work.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the bed of the Serpentine, after being thoroughly cleared of mud, should be filled up so as to leave a maximum depth of six feet in the summer months, reducible to four feet in the winter months, with an easy slope from the banks, and an adequate supply of fresh water should be secured so as to cause, during the summer months, a constant outfall at the lower end."—(Captain Grosvenor.)

MR. GOLDNEY questioned the propriety of making a great bathing establishment at the expense of the Consolidated Fund; and denied that the Serpentine was the proper place for such an establishment. He admitted it was absolutely necessary that the mud should be cleared out. With regard to the water in Regent's Park, after all the money that had been spent everybody was complaining of its present state. [Lord JOHN MANNERS: It is perfectly safe.]

That might be; but there were great complaints about the state of the water. He believed that in stagnant water there should be considerable depth to obtain what was called an under-current; and that the growth of water plants should be encouraged to absorb the noxious gases. If bathing establishments were to be erected in the metropolis, the very worst place in which they could be established was the Serpentine. The late Committee obtained a large Vote for the purposes of carrying out improvements founded upon scientific evidence. The House and the public would do well to see the contract then entered into faithfully carried out. To carry out the views of the hon. and gallant Member who made this Motion (Captain Grosvenor) he thought would be most objectionable as far as the interests of the general public were concerned.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he had visited the place the other day, and that he had come to the conclusion that the mud which he saw sticking there ought to be removed. Those, however, who went to bathe in the Serpentine ought, he thought, to be able to take care of themselves. There was a humane Society close at hand; and, in short, everything to accommodate those who wished to be drowned. Men went into the Serpentine and got glasses of brandy, hoping to see their names mentioned in The Times the next morning; but since they found their names were not inserted the numbers had decreased. The slopes at the side had, in his opinion, been very well executed, and all that was required was a sufficient coating of gravel. [An hon. MEMBER: The depth is to be 14 feet.] Well, a man could be drowned in three feet of water as well as in 14 feet, as he could assure the House from his own experience. He recollected skating in the old days, when there was a round circle at the end of the skates, and having got into the water he found he could not get up, so that he had never been so near being drowned in the whole course of his life. The fact was that if a person got under water with skates it mattered very little what the depth was. He thought there was a great deal of humbug about this question. The great thing, in his opinion, would be to have a stream of water through the Serpentine, for by that means its purity would be best secured.

Mr. Goldney

MR. AYRTON said, he did not in the least complain of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster (Captain Grosvenor), or of the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), for having brought the subject forward, because he was of opinion that the treatment of the public parks was a question which ought not to be altogether disposed of by metropolitan Members, seeing that the expenditure upon them was paid out of the national funds for what might very fairly be regarded as national objects. He wished, however, to make one or two remarks, not to justify himself, for he had no need of justification, but his Predecessor in Office, who had really made the contract which was the subject of the present discussion, and for which a grant had been made last Session. The subject was one which had engaged the attention of the Board of Works for the last 15 years. Lord Llanover, who at the commencement of that period occupied the position which he had the honour to hold, considered the question, and had arrived at the conclusion that it was not necessary to remove from the bed of the Serpentine the immense accumulation of mud which had collected there for many years. The matter was again under consideration in 1859, and the opinion of Mr. Hawksley, the eminent engineer, was taken upon it, who came to the same conclusion. Subsequently the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) took up the question with the advantage of the investigations which had previously been made. He examined all the different plans, and he, too, was of opinion that it was wholly unnecessary to remove all the mud. His immediate Predecessor in Office decided that the Report of Mr. Fowler, another eminent engineer, was one which ought to be adopted, and he had submitted a contract, after a careful analysis of the circumstances, which had been sanctioned by the Vote of the House last Session. By that contract it was provided that there should be a gradual slope at the side of the water of from one foot to six, thus allowing an ample space for the purposes of safe bathing for persons of any size. There was also to be a gradual slope from one end of the water to the other to the depth of 14 feet. The contract went on without any difficulty for a considerable period. But during the earlier part of the Session he had stated that the work was one of considerable difficulty, and he believed he was the first to throw doubts upon the likelihood of those difficulties being overcome. The operation of drying the mud was carried on slowly during the winter months, and with greater ease as the weather became warmer. The engineer had permission to extend the contract if he found its performance was hindered by the weather; but, finding that it was not completed within what he regarded as a reasonable time, he called upon the engineer to fix a time for its completion. The answer which he received was not in his opinion sufficiently precise, and he intimated that steps must be taken to secure the execution of the work. The consequence was that he received a reply a few days since stating, in point of fact, that the contractor had failed to perform his contract. If the contract had been duly executed, it would have been sufficient that the mud after being dried should be coated with gravel and clay. Finding however, that the contract could not be carried out, he had given instructions that it should be performed in what appeared to be the only practicable way—by removing the mud entirely and substituting an equivalent of gravel and clay, a process that would, however, entail an additional expenditure of £5,500, which would await the sanction of the Treasury and the House, but he had no doubt of obtaining the necessary amount. Now he might mention that it was not a very easy thing to fill up the Serpentine in the manner proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster. To get sufficient material from the Park itself, to reduce the depth from 14 feet to five or six, would require the excavation of nearly as large a space as the Serpentine itself, and if the material were carted in from outside the operation was not one that would be carried out with any great rapidity, nor was it one that it was desirable to undertake while the bed of the Serpentine was empty. The cost of such a work was at first roughly estimated by the engineer at £18,000; but on further consideration that gentleman had written him, and, after retracting that estimate, had said he did not believe that the work could be done for less than £28,000. But, in any case, the work if done at all could just as well be done when the Serpentine was full as it could now. Now, two reasons were assigned for the necessity of this work. It was said that people who bathed might possibly be drowned; but he did not believe that the depth of six feet suggested by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster would be safe to all, while for some distance from the shore the Serpentine would under the present arrangement be shallow enough to suit everybody, and if it were necessary to take any precaution, that could easily be done by putting a railing or chain beneath the water to prevent people venturing into depths which were dangerous. But it would be well for the House to consider, before it pledged itself in the manner proposed, whether it was advisable to continue on the banks of the Serpentine a system of bathing which was at once indecent, disgusting, and obscene. He had certainly witnessed much in Asia and Africa; but he had never seen anything which could approach to the obscenity exhibited in this direction. If the Serpentine were to be reserved as a bathing-place for the inhabitants of the neighbourhood it was well to consider whether the expenditure required ought not to be defrayed by those who were more immediately benefited instead of being placed on the public Exchequer. He believed, however, that there ought to be no difficulty in drawing up an adequate scheme of public bathing—a scheme by which the wealthier few should pay and the others enjoy the luxury they so much coveted free of expense. At all events, he would submit that it was extremely desirable that the House of Commons should declare that they were to have this system of public bathing not confined to one portion of the Serpentine, but spread, as the Resolution of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster seemed to contemplate, all over this piece of ornamental water. He thought that in the next Session the subject might well be considered carefully. The danger which it was said would arise in the winter occurred to two or three people in one or two years, who persisted upon going on the ice in spite of all warning, and the House ought to consider whether it should incur this large expenditure in order to meet the requirements of those eccentric people. [Laughter.] He certainly did call them eccentric. If he found that the ice was rotten, he should refrain from going on, and so, he thought, would most rational people. What they ought to do was to take upon themselves, as guardians of the Parks, to prevent people going on the ice unless it was safe — a thing which it was not at all difficult to ascertain. There was, however, danger of a different character in a piece of water of uniform shallowness by the formation of noxious growths, which could only be prevented by inequalities of depth. With that object, and on the strength of scientific opinion, the bottom of the Serpentine had been arranged. In St. James's Park it had been found necessary to draw off the water every year and scour the bed, and, though this process had not been found very difficult or expensive in the case of St. James's Park, it would be a serious matter if they had to pursue the same course in the case of the Serpentine. The same result had been found to attend the lowering the depth of the water in Regent's Park, and he had already received complaints upon that subject. He trusted that the House would not immediately and precipitately express an opinion upon this subject, especially as the work, if done at all, could as well be done later as now. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster would be satisfied in knowing that there would be a solid bed to the Serpentine composed of gravel and clay, and that he would be content to leave the other questions to be considered hereafter if necessary, so as to meet the requirements of the times.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reference to the ornamental water in the Regent's Park, great complaints had been made respecting the arrangements made after the lamentable accident which occurred there about three years ago. The fact, however, was that the arrangements agreed upon had never been carried out. It was intended that the depth of the water should be 5 feet in summer, in order to prevent it becoming stagnant, and 4 feet in winter to prevent accidents to skaters; but the medical officer of Marylebone, Mr. Whitmore, reported on the 8th of the current month to the following effect:—

"On my inspection of the mains yesterday afternoon I went over every part of it, and nowhere could I find a greater depth than 4 feet, while in many places the depth was only 3 feet 6 inches."

That gentleman recommended, as he had himself formerly proposed, that the depth should be increased to 5 feet in the summer time. He did not wish to enter into the question of the Serpentine. The right hon. Gentleman had given a correct sketch of its history, with one exception, as he had made no allusion to the full and able Report made in 1858 or 1859 by Mr. Page, and laid upon the Table of the House. Mr. Page recommended that the mud should be applied to the formation of an island, which should screen the present ugly eastern end of the lake. With respect to the right hon. Gentleman's statement as to the works proposed to be executed, he was not inclined to find any fault with it.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, that if any justification of this Motion were required the speeches of the present and of the late First Commissioner of Works would furnish it in abundance. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the present works in the Serpentine were undertaken after 15 years of consideration, at the end of which time a contract was entered into that did not include the removal of the mud. A great public agitation was raised on this point, and now the First Commissioner admitted that the public were right, and that the mud ought to be removed. The public also desired that the Serpentine should be less than 14 feet deep, and the only reason for not complying with that wish was the cost of partially filling up the river: 500,000 persons bathed there in the season, and as bathing in the Serpentine could not be stopped, the river might as well be rendered as safe for bathers as the ornamental water in the Regent's Park was for skaters. He thought that if the public were to agitate a little more his right hon. Friend would give way.

SIR HENRY HOARE said, that with a little more pressure the public would get from the Chief Commissioner all they required. To retain the mud in the Serpentine would be to continue the place one of great danger. He was glad to find that £5,000 was to be expended in removing the mud. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer had £300,000 or £400,000 surplus this year, and as he was paying off the National Debt at the rate of £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 per annum, the House might well consider the advisability of voting £20,000 for making the Serpentine safe for recreation of those Londoners who took their pastime therein.

Mr. HAMBRO said, that because a few persons were drowned in the sea every year from bathing they might as well call upon Government to make sea bathing safe as to call upon it to make the Serpentine safe for those who chose to bathe in it.

RICHARD FENNELLY.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

Mr. M'MAHON, in rising to call the attention of the House to the case of Richard Fennelly, convicted of Bribery at the last Election for Bridgwater, and of the circumstances under which he was induced to confess his participation in such Bribery, and was, notwithstanding, refused a Certificate of Indemnity; and to move a Resolution, said, he proposed to confine himself to this point—that, the House having created an extraordinary tribunal for discovering the secrets of corrupt practices, the Commissioners who were sent down to examine into the election at Bridgwater were mistaken in the course they pursued in not examining Mr. Fennelly and giving him a certificate. Mr. Fennelly had been examined by the secretary to the Commissioners, Mr. Purcell, and he afterwards wrote to them to say that, being under the impression that that gentleman had authority to examine him, he had given him all the information he required, with the firm belief that he was to be afterwards examined by the Commissioners themselves. The Commissioners, however, had not examined him, and it was greatly to be deplored that they did not adhere to the ordinary rule in such cases and hear both sides. The consequence had been that Mr. Fennelly had been refused a certificate, and that he had been prosecuted by the Attorney General. It was true it was stated by the Commissioners that they had never given any authority to their secretary to convey to Mr. Fennelly the idea that they intended to examine him; but it was clear that the influence of the secretary had induced him to make a confession of guilt, and there was, therefore, an implied understanding that having made that confession he would not be prosecuted. Mr. Fennelly under those circumstances had, he contended, a right to expect that he would be protected; and, when the matter had afterwards come before the Court of Queen's Bench, Mr. Justice Blackburn said that the point was one rather for the decision of the Secretary of State. One could not tell what might be the result of an application to the Secretary of State; but he thought that before deciding in such a matter the Secretary of State ought to hear the opinion of that House; and the House ought to see that a conviction had not been obtained by means which were in any way questionable. He moved the Address of which he had given Notice.

SIR JOHN ESMONDE, in seconding the Motion, said it appeared from the correspondence that the letter of Mr. Gould the acting secretary to Mr. Fennelly had been written with the knowledge of the Commissioners. Mr. Gould distinctly stated that it had been. In that letter Mr. Fennelly was told that he would be examined.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She may be graciously pleased to grant a free pardon to Richard Fennelly."—(Mr. M'Mahon.)

Mr. EYKYN said, the extraordinary conduct of the secretary to the Commission led him to doubt whether they might not apply to the authorities on the Treasury Bench for some modification of the position of Mr. Fennelly.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that no one but an Attorney General could appreciate the difficulties of a prosecution for bribery. If everyone who was examined, or who had been summoned for examination, received a certificate there would be very few prosecutions for bribery. He thought the granting of certificates ought to be a matter for the Commissioners; but what was now asked was that he or the Home Secretary should review the decision of the Commissioners in respect of the refusal to grant Mr. Fennelly a certificate. But the Commissioners denied that they had caused Mr. Fennelly to be informed that he would be examined as a witness. The Commissioners stated on oath that they gave no authority express or implied to their secretary to give any pledge or assurance to Mr. Fennelly that he would be examined, and that their secretary never communicated nor suggested to them that he had given Mr. Fennelly any pledge or assurance to that effect. In his belief, Mr. Fennelly gave but very partial disclosures, almost all of which went, as far as they did go, in his own favour, and the case against him had been proved by the evidence of independent witnesses. His belief was that the Commissioners had acted in a perfectly right way, and had exercised a wise discretion in doing what they had done. He, for one, could not undertake to say that Mr. Fennelly ought to have had a certificate, or that his sentence had been too severe. The matter now rested with the Home Secretary; but he was bound to state that he did not himself see any ground for interfering with the sentence.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he thought the Attorney General had, with more than his usual skill, evaded the question. The Commissioners guarded themselves by saying they gave no instructions to their secretary to examine Mr. Fennelly; but they did authorize their secretary to conduct a preliminary inquiry by putting questions to persons who were to give evidence which might criminate themselves, and they could not be exonerated from the consequences of their secretary's acts. He maintained that the Commissioners through their secretary constructively examined Mr. Fennelly, and that they were bound by what he had done.

MR. BRUCE said, the memorial addressed to him to induce him to recommend Her Majesty to extend her prerogative of mercy to the person who had been the subject of this discussion was of a very unusual character, being signed by upwards of 100 Members of Parliament. Such a memorial would, of course, demand very careful consideration. That consideration he had given to it; but he had arrived at the conclusion that the gentlemen who signed it were not fully alive to the facts of the case. There could be no doubt that Mr. Fennelly had been guilty of gross bribery—bribery for which the punishment inflicted was not too severe. It should be remembered that the Commissioners stated that the reasons which induced them to refuse Mr. Fennelly his certificate were entirely independent of his statement to Mr. Purcell. The evidence on which Mr. Fennelly was convicted was entirely independent, as Mr. Justice Hannen had stated to him, of evidence which he had furnished. It was, of course, possible for the House to overrule the decision which he had arrived at, a decision which he believed was necessary to meet the justice of the case; but if that decision were overruled the responsibility should rest with the House, and not with himself.

MR. M. GUEST moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR HENRY HOARE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned." —(Mr. Montague Guest.)

MR. J. LOWTHER appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion, as he thought the question could be decided at once.

MR. M. GUEST said, he would withdraw his Motion on the understanding that the House would at once divide on the original Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH observed that in matters of this nature he felt disposed to attach pre-eminent importance to the opinions of Her Majesty's Government, who must, of course, be in the best possible position to arrive at a just decision. After the statement which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had so fully and fairly laid before the House, he should certainly give his support to Her Majesty's Government.

GAME LAWS ABOLITION BILL—

[Mr. TAYLOR]—[Bill 73.]

(Mr. Taylor, Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. White.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th May], That the Question then proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time," be now put.

Previous Question again proposed, "That that Question be now put,"—(Mr. Hardcastle.)

Debate resumed.

Mr. McLAGAN said, that it was his intention to support the measure, though it went somewhat further than he wished; and if it failed to become law this year he should early next Session move for leave to reintroduce his Bill for taking hares and rabbits out of the game list, and for providing also for the security of the tenants' interests. He was not of the opinion that the abolition of the Game Laws would produce either all the good or all the evil that was anticipated respectively by the friends and opponents of the measure. He believed it would not do away with that legitimate sport which was so beneficial to the health of persons engaged in sedentary occupations, nor did he think that it would have the effect of reducing the value of the Scotch moors that some persons expected. If it did he should be prepared to legislate in such a manner as to remedy the evil. But he believed that the abolition of these laws would effectually remove that over-preservation of game of which there was now so much complaint. He should therefore vote for the second reading, though he should have been content with a Bill which simply withdrew the present legal protection enjoyed by ground game. He also supported this Bill as a protest against the Bills now before the House, and, especially, the Bill of the Government; and he trusted that if next year the Government introduced another Bill on the subject it would go further, and deal with the question in a more statesmanlike manner than that brought forward by them during the present Session. He would warn the House that many of the evils which were commonly attributed to the Game Laws, were really due to the Land Laws, and could never be abolished unless the House was prepared to deal in a comprehensive manner with the laws relating to the occupation of land.

MR. C. S. READ said, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) in supporting the Bill, which aimed not at the amendment of the Game Laws, but at their total abolition, and did not think that his hon. Friend had any desire to interfere with winged game. He said this the more confidently, as his hon. Friend had himself introduced a Bill to cure the game evil, and that Bill referred exclusively to hares and rabbits; and he could not believe that a Parliament which last year passed an Act for the preservation of sea birds could remove all protection from winged game. He could not consent to taking away the legal protection and a closed season which were now accorded to the partridge, that prince of birds, which, in its lifetime, did more good than harm, which furnished better sport than any other bird, and which, after its death, was a dinner fit for a king. There was no country, however republican, which did not, sooner or later, adopt some sort of Game Laws; and those of England were hardly more oppressive than the Game Laws which existed on the other side of the Atlantic. What the farmers of England, and, as he believed, the farmers of Scotland, wanted was not the destruction of partridges or of grouse, but rather that the over-preservation of hares and rabbits should cease—but then, by the present laws, hares and rabbits might be killed at all hours of the day and night, and at all seasons of the year, by any person who had a right to destroy them. And he would remind his hon. Friend that the Salmon Laws not only prevented all fishing during certain seasons, but also proscribed certain tackle for being used in their capture; and, further, their jolly friend the fox, although not in the game list, enjoyed a protection that was not accorded to any other beast of the field. With regard to the system of licences, he did not think there was much to complain of; for the farmers who had a right to kill hares could do so upon payment of 1s. for a certificate, and there was no licence required for the destruction of rabbits. But he quite agreed with the Report of the Committee of 1846, which said that the punishment for the unauthorized killing of game was excessive, and he would like to see it mitigated. He would draw the attention of the Lord Advocate to this point—if he wished to bring in a better Game Bill next year than he had done this, which he hoped he would—that he ought to do away with cumulative punishments, against which there was a very strong feeling in many parts of the country. He would illustrate his meaning by what had occurred the other day before a Bench of Magistrates at Swaffham, who, after convicting a poacher in penalties, were urged to inflict a further penalty upon him by the Board of Excise for sporting without a licence. The magistrates, in an able protest, stated that—

“Inasmuch as it is contrary to the law of England for a person to be punished twice for the same offence, and believing that it would be harsh treatment to convict him of the offence charged upon him in the said information, we do hereby acquit him of the same.”

This decision of the justices was appealed against at the last Norfolk Quarter Sessions, the counsel for the prosecution arguing thus—

“He would not say that it was not a very kind view to take, but at any rate it was a very exceptional course for a bench of magistrates to adopt in this game-preserving county. That judgment, however, was altogether erroneous in point of law, for the magistrates were bound to convict.”

The quarter sessions had therefore no choice left; but to mark their opinion of the case they mitigated the fine from £20 to £5, which was the lowest penalty they could inflict, and which he need hardly add, the prisoner was utterly unable to pay. He had been told that one hare killed cost the Union, for the maintenance of the family of the defendant while he was in gaol the sum of £17, independent of what the county had to pay for the costs of the prosecution and his imprisonment. He had had long and varied experience of the evils of over-preserving game. He had spent his boyhood on a game farm; he had been agent upon a game-preserved estate, and he had also farmed on land where he had the happiness of having the game in his own hands; and he did not hesitate to say that game caused more jealousies and more misunderstandings between landlord and tenant than any other cause whatever. It was impossible that confidence and good feeling could exist between landlord and tenant when there was an over-preservation of ground game. It was often said that the game on a farm was a matter for arrangement between the landlord and tenant, but in seasons of drought like this that really was not the case. He knew a farm in Norfolk which was well worth £1,000 a year, without game; but, in consideration of the game, it was let at £400, so that £600 a year was lost in the assessment for poor rates and other local burdens; and the tenant, being utterly ruined, had become desperate, and having nothing left on his farm but hares and rabbits, had taken it into his head to destroy them himself, contrary to his agreement. No wonder that there was in that part of his county 15,000 acres of land to let, especially when he said that a tenant, in filling up his agricultural statistics, stated, “Extra stock, 1,500 hares, the property of my landlord!” They had had a good many theories and opinions as to the number of hares and rabbits that were equal to a sheep. That was all mere guess work. The question was not to be determined in that way. Even a tame rabbit, fed on the cheapest-bought food, would cost a farthing a day, which was 7s. 6d. a year; but if they turned a flock of sheep loose upon a farm, they would soon see the difference between the actual cost of their maintenance and the damage they inflicted. So it was with the hares and rabbits. At the present season a hare destroyed ten times more corn than she ate; and in winter, when she went nibbling about, from swede to swede, she did equal damage to the root crop. It was ridiculous to talk of the tenant being allowed only one valuation a year. In fairness, he ought to be allowed to spread his loss over the whole year; and that could only be done by having the damage valued whenever it occurred. No doubt, the Game Laws were a source of demoralization among the poor; but he had little belief in that beau idéal of a poacher who shot a hare to take home to a starving wife. Therefore, he must remind the House that the model poacher of the old school hardly existed. The poacher now was seldom to be found on the game farms, but in the adjoining open village or small town, where a band existed of idle, dissolute, drunken young fellows, who, if they did not poach, would do worse. Let not the House, therefore, run away with the sentimental nonsense that the agricultural labourer was often starved into poaching. It was no such thing. But then there were other things that demoralized a neighbourhood. The tenant of a game farm was frequently a poor, heartbroken farmer, who was not able to employ the labourers round about him; and they were in a measure forced into idleness. Then the gamekeepers were sometimes taken from the lowest and worst class of the population—a reformed poacher being considered to make the best gamekeeper. Again, on these farms, it was expected that the agricultural labourers should become night watchers. Now, it was impossible that they could watch by night and work by day; and, hence, they fell into listless and drunken habits. Then, above all things, there was the hateful and demoralizing practice of buying pheasant's eggs. It encouraged boys to thieve from their infancy; and it was as foolish as it was wicked, because the game preserver as often bought his own birds' eggs as his neighbour's. And if these evils existed where the landlord preserved his game, they were aggravated ten-fold when he let the right of sporting to a stranger. The landlord had always some sympathy with his tenants: the stranger did not care a straw for them; his only object was to get as much sport as he could. He might be told that the landlord thus got two rents; but he had no right to allow the smaller rent to eat out the greater. For these reasons, he would be glad to see it provided by law that if the landlord did not choose to keep the game in his own hands, he should be bound to offer it in the first instance to the tenant. The noble Lord the Member for Cambridgeshire (Viscount Royston) had previously said in this debate that game was property, and that a man had a right to do what he would with his own. He (Mr. C. S. Read) denied both propositions. Live game was not property, and had never been held to be so—and he could not see how it ever should—because, when it was upon one side of the hedge it belonged to one owner, and when on the opposite side it belonged to another man; and when a person so exercised his rights as to make them a nuisance to his neighbours and the public, the law stepped in and prohibited him from such a use, or rather an abuse of his rights. He did not understand how, in this free country, the landlord's rights were to be respected and the tenant's ignored—that there should be protection to hares and rabbits, and no protection to corn and turnips. He then came to the important point of a remedy. The first remedy he would trust to was the influence of public opinion; and he believed that had done much, and would do still more. He appealed also with much stronger confidence and hope to the good sense and the kindly feeling of the landlords of this great country. He hoped there would be a better understanding on this question between them—that the landlord would trust his tenant more and his gamekeeper less. If all landlords were to follow the example set by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. H. G. Sturt), he believed they would have no complaints from tenant-farmers as to the injurious operation of the Game Laws. But he confessed that recent events had shaken his faith in this ameliorating influence. The battue sport had become such a fashionable mania, and as there was such an unfortunate rage for it, it had spread far and wide over the country. The great man in the district had always some Royal Prince, or some noble Duke, or some Nabob from India on a visit; and he must give his distinguished friend a wonderful day's shooting by butchering all his game that was formerly killed in five months, in about as many hours. And, unfortunately, the evil was that this practice was not confined to the great man, but every little squire in the neighbourhood imitated his example. The law gave the tenants the right to the game, and they invariably turned that right over to their landlords; but he believed that it would be for the interests of the tenants, for the benefit of agriculture, and for the good of the public, if Parliament stepped in and said to the tenant—"You shall not entirely abrogate the rights we have given you; it shall at least be the joint right of the landlord and the occupier of the soil to kill hares and rabbits." He admitted that this would be called an interference with freedom of contract; but just as a few bad landlords in Ireland had brought about the Irish Land Bill, so he feared that a few unscrupulous preservers of hares and rabbits would not only annihilate the Game Laws, but would ere long also do away with all legitimate sport in this country.

MR. TILLET said, he would not so soon have obtruded himself on the attention of the House, but that, as a Norfolk man, he could not sit still while this subject was under discussion. He agreed with all the facts and arguments addressed to them by his hon. Friend and neighbour who had just sat down, but he did not agree in his conclusions, as he could not understand how, after the strong facts and the able arguments the hon. Gentleman had used in the appeal he had made to the landlords generally, he should, after all, vote against the Motion before the House. But he agreed with the hon. Gentleman that there was a middle course to be pursued, and he trusted that it would be adopted by the landlords while yet it could be done. He hoped the tenant-farmers would be met on that ground. He believed that when the tenant-farmers got the protection of the Ballot very decided pledges would be exacted from candidates on this question; and it would now be a gracious act on the part of the landlords if, in order to meet reasonable views, they conceded something which might set the question at rest for years to come. The middle course he had just referred to was to leave hares and rabbits out of the Game Laws. His knowledge of the farmers of Norfolk was only inferior to that of his hon. Friend, and he would say that there was no desire on their part to deprive the gentry of the country of a proper amount of sport. They respected their landlords, and desired that they should pass as much time as possible in the country. But then that sport ought not to go so far as to ruin, or even to cause distress and anxiety to the tenant-farmers. He knew the farmers entertained a strong feeling that they were unjustly treated by the over-preservation of game. He was in favour of the principle of the Bill, and he believed that the Game Laws were not founded on principle. They attempted to make property what was not property, and great mischief had arisen from Parliament making criminal what the people could not be brought to regard as so highly criminal. That had a demoralizing effect. Many a youth who would shrink from committing a felony was led into poaching, and from thence he went on to graver crimes. Then he must remind the House that this question affected the consumers of food, who had a right to declare that no agreement should be come to between the owner of the soil and the cultivator which would prevent the latter obtaining from the soil the greatest possible amount of produce. Therefore, on grounds of public policy he supported the Bill; and another reason was this—every effort ought to be made to promote a good feeling among all classes, but he believed the Game Laws really engendered feelings in the minds of tenant-farmers which were not reconcilable with the proper affection and respect which the tenant ought to entertain towards his landlord and neighbour. There would be every disposition to meet the supporters of the Game Laws if they should be prepared to draw a line between four-footed game and winged game; that the four-footed ought to be left to be killed by anyone who could do so without committing a trespass, and that any restrictions on the tenant in that respect ought to be prohibited. Entertaining these views, he should support the second reading of the Bill, but should be glad to see some provision introduced which would secure to the landlord a proper and reasonable amount of sport.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, he believed that rabbits were generally considered a common enemy. In the district with which he was connected a great deal of profit was derived from underwoods, of which rabbits were great destroyers, and it was most desirable for the interests of both landlords and tenants to keep the rabbits down as much as possible. But the difficulty of getting at them in wooded districts was so great that it was almost impossible to keep them down. He knew that there were a great many abuses connected with the preservation of ground game, and so long as those abuses existed it would be impossible to expect a good feeling to exist between the landlord and the tenant, but he did not see how the difficulty which existed could be met by legislation. He was afraid that upon the question of game preserving, a great deal of obloquy had been cast upon a class in consequence of the faults of a few. In the part of the country with which he was connected the best feeling prevailed on the subject between landlord and tenant, and he believed that the spread of that friendly understanding was the best remedy for the evils with which the Bill proposed to deal.

SIR HENRY HOARE said, he would support the second reading of the Bill, but if it should be carried he intended to propose clauses in Committee to neutralize its worst effects. He was quite sure that the supporters of the Bill did not wish to see every pheasant and partridge blown out of the country, which would be the effect of the passing of this Bill; but they wanted some measure to meet the growing evil of over-preservation. The destruction to plantations by rabbits was incalculable, and it was almost impossible to prevent it, for he had seen rabbits scale wire nettings to get at the plants. They also did injury to the land itself, which they poisoned and rendered unfit for agricultural purposes. He did not believe winged game to be destructive of agricultural produce, and many of his tenants had told him that the good produced by pheasants and partridges far outweighed any harm caused by them. He thought that to drop hares and rabbits out of the list of game would be the best remedy that could be devised for the evils that existed. He was ready to see the Game Laws abolished, but there must then be an amendment of the Trespass Act, for it was impossible that notice could be given to every poacher that he was committing a trespass.

Mr. HERMON said, that as the Bill went for the total abolition of the Game Laws, he must vote against it. Had its object been the modification of the laws, then it would have been open to his consideration. He lived in a part of the country where there were perhaps more hares than in any other part of the kingdom. He preserved game on a considerable extent of land, on which there was scarcely a rabbit to be found. He wished to bear his testimony to the good feeling which existed in the minds of the farmers, who were always glad to see any of his friends. The great grievance which the farmer felt was this—that in some instances as many as 400 or 500 hares were sometimes sent to market in the course of a week. When the farmers saw the preservers of game becoming wholesale dealers in it he thought they had some right to complain, and should be glad to see some provision that wherever a proprietor continued to preserve hares they should either let them be the gift of the farmer, or, if they were sent to market, they should pay 2s. per head for every hare and 6d. per head for every rabbit.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he wished to explain to the House the reason why he supported the second reading of the Bill now before it, as he had hitherto supported the Game Laws, in spite of strong representations made to him to act in a contrary manner. He did not now think that a total abolition of the Game Laws would be a great benefit; but he had recently had occasion to look into the Bill of the learned Lord Advocate, and he had come to the conclusion that the Game Laws were in such a muddle at present that it would be very difficult for anyone to say what was law on every point connected with game, and what was not. What was game was as great a delusion as any he knew of. He himself used to think that there was a game list, and that anyone could easily refer to it and see what was game and what was not, but he found there was no such list in existence. There were a great number of Acts in existence relating to game, but there was not one which properly defined what game really was. Then there was a different system in Scotland from what there was in England and Ireland. In England various birds came under the head of game which did not in Scotland; while in Ireland such birds as wild ducks and a number of animals were put in the game list which were not put in in the other parts of the kingdom. In point of fact, the Irish game list was a much more copious one than was the game list in the other portions of the United Kingdom. Another reason why he wished to support this Bill was that no satisfactory Bill had hitherto been brought before the House upon this question, at least, since he had been in it. The one that was brought in by the learned Lord Advocate was, he thought, most unsatisfactory not in what it did do, but in respect to what it did not do; his Bill, indeed, so far as it went, was a very good Bill, but it went so small a distance that practically it was useless. As regards the game which were to be dealt with in that Bill, he was struck with the number of birds it left out, and equally so with one of the birds at least that it put in. For instance, he observed with some surprise the ptarmigan family were left out, but he was struck with still greater astonishment to find that such a bird as the bustard was put in. Why, the bustard had not been seen in Scotland for hundreds of years, and he did not believe that it had been tried in England for hundreds of years, notwithstanding which, this unfortunate bustard was put into the Bill as a game bird. He really thought that the best thing which could be done would be to appoint a special Committee of the House to sit for a week or two in the ensuing Session, in order to define what was game and what was not, and what ought to be so considered. It was certainly not a licence to kill, it was certainly not a penalty for pursuit, it was certainly not a close time—none of those three things constituted game. He should like very much to find out what it was that really did constitute it. There was one other point in the Bill of the learned

Sir Henry Hoare

Lord to which an allusion had just been made by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. S. Read) and that was, that any claim which the tenant had for damages could only be made at one period of the year, which would have the effect of limiting the time in which he could bring an action for damages, and it entirely precluded any action for damages which might be done to green crops. All that took place in the winter. He (Mr. Anderson) thought that was a point which deserved very great consideration. There had been various other Bills brought in—one by the hon. Member below him (Mr. Brown) which was certainly not a satisfactory measure; neither was that which had been brought in by the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs (Mr. Loch) altogether satisfactory. Altogether there was such a confusion in the Bills which had been proposed to amend the Acts relating to the pursuit of game, that he had come to the conclusion that the simplest and the best way to proceed was to repeal the whole of them. But he must say that for all that he should like to have some fair and reasonable protection for game.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he was unable to vote for the second reading of the Bill in its present form. If the present law should be abolished, it would be absolutely necessary to effect an improvement in the Trespass Act, and that game should be made property. He thought it desirable that the consideration of the subject should be postponed until next Session, in order to see what measure the Government would propose. He agreed with the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. S. Read) in the distinction which he had drawn between four-footed and winged game, and thought the former should be allowed to be killed by anyone, provided he did not commit a trespass.

MR. M. T. BASS said, he thought it like fighting with a shadow to contend against the present Bill, for anything more worthless he had never seen. He considered it one of the most daring attempts at legislation ever known, and one of the rudest attacks on property. It would be just as reasonable to propose to distribute all lands and houses and personal property amongst the whole population. It could not be denied that the Bill dealt with property. He would remind the House that a large proportion of the rental of Scotland was dependent on game, and no complaint was made by the tenants. The rights of shooting were let at £500, £1,000, and, in some instances, at £2,000 a year, and he had no doubt that the sum produced in that way amounted to £100,000; but no compensation was proposed in the Bill. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor) wished that all game and all property in game should be destroyed. The principle urged by the hon. Member that the preservation of game was not the best use to make of land, was one which would apply equally to parks, gardens, shrubberies, and pleasure grounds, to large houses, and to many other luxuries. He (Mr. Bass) admitted that there was over-preservation, but public opinion was not against a proper Game Law; and he believed that the majority of the tenants, if protected against over-preservation, would support the continuance of the law. He himself held 1,000 acres under the Crown and was bound by contract to supply Her Majesty with a certain number of hares, pheasants, and partridges annually. But the poachers took the largest share of the game on the property, and he could not obtain the required number. He was obliged to make up the deficiency by purchasing from a dealer in London. It was a waste of time to proceed with the discussion of this Bill. He trusted that the Bill would be withdrawn and that a more reasonable measure would be brought in next Session. He had taken some pains while in Scotland this year to inquire what was the opinion of competent people on the subject, and though there was a difference of opinion upon the present Bill, many of the farmers being dissatisfied with it, still there were many others who regarded it as a good Bill, as the power given to the tenants to destroy ground game could not fail to operate beneficially.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he rose to a point of Order. One of the objects of this Bill was to repeal the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. 14. But another Bill for the repeal of the same Act was rejected by the House the other day on the Motion for its second reading. Of course the House could not consider the same question twice in one Session, and he believed that that objection would be fatal to the passing of this Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Bill of the hon. Member was printed before the decision referred to was arrived at. The Bill could proceed until they came to the Schedule in Committee, when it would be competent to strike out so much of the Bill as proposed the repeal of the Act in question.

MR. LOCH said, he thought every one would admit that the Game Laws were fast approaching a period in their history in which they would have to undergo considerable change, if not entire abolition. There was a general opinion that the evils existing under those laws ought not to be permitted to exist. He strongly objected to the unexpected withdrawal of the Government Bill on the subject of the Game Laws, and he had heard with astonishment the recent declaration of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that the Government were not pledged to deal with the question, for on the 2nd of March last the right hon. Gentleman himself promised that the Government would deal with the Game Laws so far as they related to Scotland. Perhaps he might be permitted for a moment to refer to the report of Hansard. The words which the right hon. Gentleman used were these—

“Mr. BAUCE said, that he had an appeal to make to the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Loch) upon the subject of this measure. At the close of last Session, the Government had undertaken to deal with the difficult question of the Game Laws of Scotland; but although the Bill was in a forward state, it was not yet in a condition to be laid before the House. He had therefore to request the hon. Member to be kind enough to postpone the second reading of his Bill until that of the Government had been laid before the House. He would undertake, on the part of the Government, that the hon. Member would lose nothing by consenting to this proposition.”—[3 Hansard, excix. 1111.]

Now, he thought that no words could convey more distinctly than those a pledge on the part of Her Majesty's Government to discuss the question fully. Such a question could only be efficiently dealt with by the Government, and it was with that feeling that he had postponed his own Bill on the subject until the House could have an opportunity of discussing the Government measure. He would not go into the merits of the Game Laws, but he should vote for the second reading of this Bill as a protest against the existing state of things. He was not in favour of the total abolition of the Game Laws, for he thought that the adoption of such a course would be a great mistake, as it would place the relations between landlord and tenant in a position of considerable difficulty, and open the door to trespassing and poaching of all kinds.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he shared in the regret which had been expressed that an opportunity had not been afforded to the House of discussing the whole question upon the Government Bill; but he felt sure that no Member of the House would be disposed upon consideration to attribute blame to the Government in connection with the matter. The time and energy of the Government and of the House had been taxed to the utmost by the great and important measures which had occupied their attention this Session up to the present period, and it was utterly impossible that the Game Bill promised by the Government should have been proceeded with. The Government Bill only proposed to deal with the Game Laws as a question between landlord and tenant. The measure assumed, like the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Loch), that the outside world—those who were neither proprietors nor tenants of land—were in future, as they had been in the past, to be excluded from trespassing upon private property. It might be that the Trespass or Poaching Acts directed against those who were described by the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. C. S. Read) as idle, dissolute, lawless vagabonds, were too severe in their provisions; but, if so, the Government Bill did not deal with the matter at all, but left it altogether untouched for anyone to take up who chose to do so. With regard to the present measure, he wished to know whether it was presented to the House as a Bill founded upon a principle sound in itself, which ought to be carried out to its legitimate conclusions, or whether it was put forward as a piece of exceptional legislation, to meet an exceptional case or emergency? If it were put forward as a measure founded upon a sound general principle, intended to be carried out to its legitimate results, he would like to know what that principle was. He could find no information on that point within the four corners of the Bill itself or in the speeches which had been made in support of it; other than this—that it was not legitimate to allow property to be used in any manner which would diminish the amount of its available produce, and that any use of it which would be injurious to the community by diminishing the produce—I suppose of food or clothing—ought to be prevented by legislative enactment. If that principle were maintained as sound, and as the foundation of legislation, then, as the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) had unanswerably suggested, it would be sufficient to put down parks, shrubberies, gardens, and ornamental pleasure grounds that were too large for the reasonable accommodation of the occupants. Indeed there was nothing in the principle which would limit its application to land, for it would apply to anything, the use of which was not such as would produce the greatest amount of material return to the community. It would apply to money and certainly to houses, for there ought to be no houses too large for the occupiers while there were multitudes unhoused. Then people ought not to employ their money in show, ostentation, extravagance, or luxury of any kind, while others were going about destitute of the means of comfortable livelihood. In short, the principle would introduce sumptuary laws, and establish the doctrine that it was not legitimate to squander money in any way while there was so many poor who were without bread, without clothing, and without comfortable roofs to shelter them. But would that principle commend itself to the opinion of the House? Would they sanction such a legislative interference with the rights of property, compelling people by statute to use their property in a certain way which would be better for the general public than for their own purposes? It was a right principle of political economy to allow the proprietors, within certain limits indeed, to deal with their property in the manner which to them should seem best, and not to interfere with the use which they might make of it because it might be demonstrated that a more profitable use was possible. The question of principle therefore could not be defended, and this Bill must be supported on the ground that it was an exceptional piece of legislation, dealing with an exceptional case or an emergency of some kind or other. It had been said by one hon. Member (Viscount Royston) that such an interference as this Bill proposed would be resisted on the ground that proprietors were entitled to do what they liked with their own property. The answer had been made that game was not property. He was rather disposed to agree with that view, for it was impossible to make property of wild animals which would change their owners whenever they crossed the boundary line between two estates. But that was no answer to the objection which was founded on a just principle of political economy. It was not the property in game, but the property in land which was in question. The right of property in land led to this—that the proprietor was entitled to exclude from his land for any purposes of profit, pleasure, or amusement, all those who had not his permission to go upon it, whether that permission was given gratuitously, or under a contract. This was the common law of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and it was this right of property which would be interfered with by this Bill. But how would this Bill interfere with that right? Suppose a man had bought an estate for the legitimate purpose of having healthful recreation in the pursuit of game, and had no tenant at all—he took that case in order to disembarass the question of any considerations with respect to tenancy. What the Bill proposed was that the land owned by the man and occupied by himself should be thrown open to any of that class described, I suppose accurately, as idle, dissolute, lawless vagabonds—who chose to go upon it for the purpose of destroying any game they might find there. It was said that that was not interfering with the rights of property, because there was no property in wild animals; but the estate would be thrown open to those people, who might damage it as much as they pleased provided they could show that they were in pursuit of game. The only way of restraining such people would be by an ordinary action at law, but he was sure that the House would agree with him in considering that a very idle process against these idle, dissolute, lawless vagabonds. The Trespass and Poaching Acts might be too severe in their present form; but at all events they ought to be left in such a state as to protect the established and recognized rights of property against such depredations. The Bill declared that the present laws which it proposed to repeal were injurious to the cultivators of the soil; but if the Bill passed, there could be very little doubt that the freedom which it would give to these idle, dissolute, lawless vagabonds would also be very injurious to the cultivators of the soil. It was said that if it passed, poaching would cease, and there would be a marked diminution of crime. Certainly, one way of putting an end to poaching was by repealing the laws which existed upon the subject, for where there was no law there could be no transgression; but the same argument might be used in favour of putting an end to property by abolishing the laws which protected it. Where there was no game there could be no poachers; where there was no property there could be no thieves. But that was not a very satisfactory way of getting rid of crime, and of such nuisances as were referred to in this Bill. With regard to the case of the tenants, his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had said that the Game Laws were in such a muddle that it was most desirable to get rid of them, and that if there was any Game Law at all, it should be so clear that anyone could understand it. Now, he rather thought the "muddle" was not so much in the law as in his hon. Friend's view of it. The Game Law was simply the law of property. He regarded it from this point of view—The tenant-farmer was a party on the land by contract with the proprietor; and he had no right to be there at all except under the contract which made him the tenant. Now, the contract was generally made with him for agricultural purposes, and if the game on the farm were reserved by the landlord, what question could there be between the landlord and tenant? There would be the question of rent, and nothing more. Of course, if the game were reserved by the landlord, the rent was less than it would be if the game were not reserved, and was Parliament to interfere in order to prescribe the rent at which lands should be let? If the tenant paid more for his farm than under the circumstances it was really worth it was his own fault. The Legislature could not protect him in that matter. He must trust to his own sagacity and to his own power of making a contract which would be satisfactory to him. But this Bill went the length of proposing to interfere with the contract—and to say that a contract, when made between landlord and tenant with respect to game, should not be legally binding. Parliament might as well at once lower the tenant's rent. Suppose a proprietor, instead of letting his land for agricultural uses, retained it for that purpose, but let the game, how would they deal with him? Could it be said that he should be at liberty to shoot the game because they were eating his crops—on the ground that his killing them would benefit the State by increasing the quantity of food. The contract was precisely the same in the two cases. He ventured to think that the tenant-farmers could everywhere be left to take care of themselves in this matter; for, so far from their being oppressed, heart-broken, and half-starved men, they were a well-to-do class, keenly alive to business, and were well able to make their calculations. The demand for farms was far greater than the supply. That would not be the case if the business were not profitable. Farmers were anxious to secure the land whenever it was in the market. No doubt, the tenant-farmer made his bargain upon the implied understanding that there would be a reasonable exercise of the right reserved. There might be individual cases of disappointment; and, in reference to those matters, the Government Bill would provide a remedy. In short, the Government Bill proposed to give a remedy in cases of real hardship from the unreasonable and immoderate preservation of game to the positive detriment of the tenant. On both sides of the House there had been some criticism of that provision which enabled a tenant to make only one claim for damages from game in the year, and that must be made before the term of Martinmas which occurred in November. It was said by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) that there was great injustice in this, for the tenant would not then be able to claim for damage which had not then been sustained. His hon. Friend seemed to forget that from Martinmas to Martinmas included the whole year, and, therefore, damage to green crops might be claimed as well as to grain crops. This was a mere matter of detail; but he must say that he had been considerably impressed with the observations which had been made to the effect that it would be more convenient to allow the tenant-farmer to make a claim for the damage done to the farm twice during the year, for the simple reason that it would enable him to make it immediately after the damage was sustained, while the crops were still in the ground, and in such a condition that the exact measure of the damage might be ascertained, instead of having to wait until long afterwards, when it might be more difficult to ascertain its exact amount.

Mr. P. A. TAYLOR, in reply, said, that the arguments which had been advanced in the course of the discussion had been both various and numerous. He might say that some hon. Members who had supported the Bill in argument were not going to support it by their votes, while others who were going to support it by their votes had not supported it in argument. He must say that the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate appeared to have been prepared and intended to have been delivered when the Irish Land Bill was before the House. He had no doubt that if it had been delivered then it would have been hailed with still more rapturous cheers from hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Lord Advocate had attempted to overwhelm the question with a number of legal subtleties which he almost wondered he should have addressed to that House. The learned Gentleman misrepresented the principle of the Bill now before them. He said the principle of this Bill was that nothing should be done with the land that was not intended to bring about the most economical results—the production of the greatest amount of food or of clothing. He (Mr. Taylor) had laid down no such principle. The principle that he laid down was that property was the creature of law, and that it must be regulated so as to produce the greatest amount of public good. He was a humble disciple of the school of Mill, than whom no man went further in his recognition of the necessity of modifying the rights of landowners, and yet he would compel a considerable amount of land to be left wild, or in common, for the artistic or intellectual improvement of the people. He (Mr. Taylor) thought that the advocates of the abolition of the Game Laws had every reason to be satisfied with the general course and tenour of the discussion which had taken place. He felt himself a strong conviction that if he did not carry the second reading of this Bill, at any rate the solution of this question was nearer by some years than it appeared to be a year ago. He felt a strong conviction also that he had hit upon the real solution of the difficulty of the question, and if he might venture to say so, that he had chosen the right time for bringing it forward. There were three or four conclusions to which the House might be said to have practically arrived. In the first place, it was practically acknowledged that the sole object of the Game Laws was to provide the amusement of sport for the wealthy classes. He must say he wished our country gentlemen could on the question of their diversions be brought more into harmony with our favourite poet Cowper, when he exclaimed—

That owes its pleasure to another's pain.”

Another conclusion which seemed to be arrived at was, that an enormous amount of damage was done to the country by the over preservation of game; that was a conclusion which was accepted on all sides. At a recent meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, it was stated that if there were no game the landed gentry would have no inducement to spend their time among their tenantry. But though he believed that farmers and country people desired the permanent residence of their landlords among them, yet he believed they would rather forego that blessing than give up the privileges and rights which were due from the land to every human being in these islands. Another conclusion was, the enormous amount of crime which was caused by this law, and the prodigious number of convictions which took place under it every year. Of that fact the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Sturt) said that it “made him uneasy, and was a disgrace to a civilized country.” In the same amusing speech the hon. Member somewhat inconsistently remarked that in convicting poachers they were but convicting thieves. Now, it was all very well to speak of poachers as thieves and vagabonds; but he appealed to the common sense of every man in the House whether there was not a distinct difference between a man who took a hare, and a man who took money out of your pocket. The hon. Member for South Norfolk said he agreed with him (Mr. Taylor) as to some of the evils caused by the Game Laws; but the next moment he went off on another tack, and argued against the Bill, because he said it was not John Hodge any longer who caught a hare to support his starving family, but a vagabond from some neighbouring town. Well, that was his (Mr. Taylor's) case—that if you hang up either silver spoons or pheasants on a hedge you would attract the idle vagabonds of the neighbourhood to the spot to get them. Another conclusion was, that these laws could not remain as they are, but that they must be dealt with in some way or other. Everybody acknowledged the evil of the Game Laws, and every Session half-a-dozen Bills were brought forward to remedy them. The immediate introducers of those Bills were anxious about them; but no one else believed in them. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. S. Read) said lately, at the Central Chamber of Agriculture—"The law as it stood was totally ineffectual to prevent a flagrant amount of injustice." And again, though he extremely regretted the necessity for legislative interference with regard to the Game Laws, he felt that tenants were driven to ask for something of that kind, because—he did not wish to use strong language, but he could not help doing so—because of the rascality of a few owners of land, who would persist in the over-preservation of ground game. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary observed—and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) accepted the statement—that the only real solution of this question was to make game property. He (Mr. Taylor) trusted that no Government would ever attempt to get that done. The idea of making game property, employing a whole army of police, and a standing army to protect it, and filling their gaols no longer with poachers but with felons, was really too ludicrous to be entertained. The hon. Member, whose observations were continually interrupted by cries for a Division, proceeded to comment upon the proceedings of the Government in respect of this question, and especially in regard to the Act of 1862, which had been referred to in the course of the debates as a success. Well, he did not deny that it was a success—but in whose interests, and from whose point of view? In the interests of game preserving, and from the point of view of the game preserver. It had not diminished the head of game. It had not, therefore, of course, diminished the damage to the farmers' crops. Wherein, then, had consisted its success? It had added nearly 1,000 convictions a year to the already bloated record of the previous Game Laws. It was right that the country should understand that the success attained had consisted in the ruin of certain other thousands of English homes, and in saddling the rates with the cost of police gamekeepers, the maintenance of poachers in prison, and of their families in the Union-house. He did not see the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Sturt) in his place, and he was sorry for it, because he should have been glad to express to him his gratitude for what he said when the Bill was last under discussion. There could be nothing more calculated to show the country what the Game Laws really were, and what were the evils attending game preserving, than the speech of that hon. Gentleman. He knew it was supposed that the hon. Member defended the Game Laws, and made a somewhat violent attack upon him (Mr. Taylor). Now, he must say he did not at all take that view of the matter. It was an entire mistake. The whole of the hon. Gentleman's speech was nothing but a subtle, humorous, and powerful attack on the game-preserving interest, and on the Game Laws. He said that he would give game preservers some advice, which they would be more likely to take from him than from him (Mr. Taylor). He was sorry to say that was too true, and he thanked him sincerely for coming to his rescue; but the principal part of his speech was composed of elaborate pictures of two kinds of game preservers; the one belonging to the best, the other to the worst kind of preservers. He himself sat for his picture of the best ideal game preserver, and he (Mr. Taylor) could sincerely say that he believed he well deserved that title. Now, what was that picture? Why, he told them that he would have nothing to do with ground game, but reared many thousand pheasants per annum, and turned the whole of the neighbouring population into gamekeepers. The hon. Gentleman was far too sensible a man to think for a moment that this country, or even this House, would recognize such an ideal condition of society as that which transformed the whole rural population into gamekeepers to maintain the amusements of the wealthy. He might ask what the farmers of the neighbourhood thought of this cloud of 4,000 pheasants? The hon. Gentleman remarked that he treated his people like Christians, and they naturally became his gamekeepers. But the connection between Christianity and game preserving was sufficiently remote to prove that the hon. Gentleman meant that for a joke. But what he thought of the other kind of game preserver was manifest enough by the advice which he gave them. He said—"I advise you to treat your people with common decency, house them like Christians, behave to them as if they were human beings, kill off your rabbits, cut down your hares to the smallest amount; do all this, and, above all, do not let your shooting for a few paltry, dirty sovereigns, to strangers." Why did the hon. Member give that advice?—was it because it was needed or not needed? It was because that it was needed, and he (Mr. Taylor) said that it was a perfect justification for his Bill; for supposing that the good advice was taken by one-half, or three-fourths, or nine-tenths of this class of preservers—as the hon. Member well knew that it would not be—the protection of law would still be required against—to use the language of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Read)—"the rascality of a few owners of land who would persist in the over-preservation of ground game." Laws were made not for those whom conscience made to act justly without coercion, but precisely for the minority, whom nothing but law could restrain. That was how he understood the speech of the hon. Member for Dorsetshire, and he again thanked him for it. But if the hon. Member persisted in declaring that it was intended to uphold the Game Laws, and to oppose his Bill, then he ventured to tell the hon. Member that every word which had been uttered in these debates had tended—the hon. Member would not object to the words—"to deny his statements, to refute his arguments, to annihilate his doctrines, and, in fine, to shut him up altogether."

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS (1866-1869) REPEAL.—LEAVE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [24th May], "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal the Contagious Diseases Acts 1866-1869."—(Mr. William Fowler.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Mr. CRAUFURD rose, and said: Mr. Speaker, I see Strangers present.

Then Strangers were ordered to withdraw.

The following is believed to be an accurate representation of the several Members who addressed the House on the Motion, so far as they can be ascertained:—

Mr. JACOB BRIGHT: Sir, the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) may be unaware of the fact that in the present Session of Parliament some 700 or 800 Petitions, signed by nearly 500,000 persons, have been presented to this House, asking for a repeal of the Acts which are now under discussion. By the course which he is now taking he is not only acting contrary to the wishes of the vast majority of the House, but he is also preventing the country from knowing what takes place here upon a subject in which it has expressed the deepest interest. Some tell me that this widespread opposition to these Acts arises from ignorance. I believe it springs from knowledge, because the more thoroughly I have understood these Acts myself, the more I find myself opposed to them. But if this earnest opposition of the people does arise from ignorance, where does the fault lie? Look at the stealthy way in which they have passed this House. They have been brought forward either late at night or late in the Session, and every effort has been made to stifle discussion. So far as I can discover from Hansard, only two short speeches were made during the passage of these Acts—one by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley); one by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton). Both attacked this legislation in the bitterest terms of condemnation; no case was made out for the Acts; and it is an unprecedented thing that so serious an innovation should have taken place without any speaking whatever but that which was in direct opposition. Let us look now at what occurred in the Lords. The defenders of the other Chamber—and they are not becoming more numerous—always maintain that it is necessary as a check to rash legislation. When the character of that House comes to be discussed in the future, it will not be forgotten that it passed these odious Acts entirely without debate. The Press joined this great conspiracy of silence. That institution to which we are so much indebted, which criticizes with so much advantage the proceedings of Parliament—one of whose noblest functions it is to guard the country from unjust legislation, on this remarkable occasion abandoned those functions, and up to this hour there are great London newspapers which have opened their columns freely to the supporters of these Acts, and which reject answers from the most competent persons. Before the passing of these Acts there was no inquiry, I mean, of course, no real, no impartial inquiry. There were Committees of Investigation to which I shall, for a moment, refer. There was a Committee of the House of Commons which sat last year. I believe I am correct when I say that every witness examined by that Committee was in the pay and employment of the Government. There was a Committee of the Lords which sat in 1868. This Committee seems to me to have been the creature and the tool of an outside Association, an Association for extending these Acts to the whole country. This Association is said to number among its members Peers and Prelates, Members of the House of Commons, and clergymen of the Church of England, and yet it bears a fraudulent name, and dares not adopt a title which shall exhibit its real objects. It calls itself an Association for extending these Acts to the civil population of the whole kingdom, when its real object is to extend them to the female population of the kingdom. Between these two adjectives, civil and female, there is as broad a distinction as between any two words in the English language. Then there was a Committee which sat in 1865, presided over by the eminent surgeon Mr. Skey. Before that Committee there were examined some scores of doctors, men connected with the Army and Navy, men belonging to the police. I admit that doctors are acquainted with disease, that men connected with the Army and Navy know something of naval and military matters, and that the police have their special instincts; but when Parliament, in an important matter of legislation, submits to be guided by a congregation of professional men, it is liable to make stupendous blunders, and two or three years will not pass over without our finding that we have made such a blunder in this instance. The Association for extending these Acts has been doing all in its power to deceive the public, not intentionally, of course. They have a zeal in what to Englishmen is a new, but not an exalted, faith; and zealots have very little mental control. They have been endeavouring, by the grossest exaggerations, to frighten the public into accepting this legislation. I am supported in this view by the most eminent authorities. Dr. Skey says—

“The public mind is alarmed; it has been coloured too highly. The disease is by no means so common or so universal; and I have had an opportunity to-day of communicating with several leading members of the profession at the College of Surgeons, and we are all of the same opinion—that the evil is not by any means so large as has been represented. I think if you took the impression of any individual on reading the reports of the Association for extending the Acts, you would infer an extent of syphilis in society far beyond the truth—very decidedly beyond the truth. It is not so common; it is not so severe.”

I quote next from Professor Syme, of Edinburgh. He says—

“It is now fully ascertained that the poison of the present day, though arising from similar local sores, does not give rise to the dreadful consequences which have been mentioned. The case may be tedious, and skin, throat, or periosteum may be slightly affected, but none of the serious effects that used to be so much dreaded ever appear, and even the trivial ones just noticed comparatively seldom present themselves. We, therefore, conclude either that the violence of the poison is worn out, or that the effects formerly attributed to it depended on treatment.”

I shall give one extract from Mr. Acton, a great supporter of this legislation. Mr. Acton is probably the most illogical man who ever put pen to paper, but he is a gentleman of character, and therefore his statements will be accepted. He says—“Mild results now form the penalty of frailty.” He further says—

"Notwithstanding their excesses and exposure to many causes of disease, the health of prostitutes resists all attacks better than that of the ordinary run of women who have children and lead orderly lives."

We are told that these Acts are required in the interest of innocent wives and children. This seems to me like asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer to spend the people's money in order that British husbands may commit adultery with impunity. I could give the highest authorities to prove that inherited disease, even among the lowest and least protected class of the London poor, is small. We are told that this disease descends from generation to generation. Sir William Jenner says he never knew a case go beyond one generation. Dr. Arthur Farre says—

"The conclusion that I came to, after many years' experience, was that syphilis in infants was one of the most easily-cured complaints that could be met with, provided the treatment was commenced sufficiently early, in which case the cure was as certain as of any complaint that could be named."

Mr. Erasmus Wilson says—

"I look upon syphilitic diseases as so manageable a complaint, in comparison with other diseases of the skin, that it is always a source of pleasure to me when I have to deal with syphilitic disease."

If our alarmists were sincere they would be irresistibly driven to the conclusion that the Contagious Diseases Acts should apply to the civil, and not merely to the female population. The truth is—and everyone knows it who has investigated this question—that during each succeeding decade these diseases have become milder and prevail less extensively. Is there anyone in this House who will stand up and say that the people of this country are less healthy than people living in those countries where this hateful institution has so long existed? The broad facts of our national life contradict the supposition. Look at our industry and commerce; they exhibit an energy unequalled in the world. We have covered not only our own land, but every other land with public works. In time of war, if we have met with difficulty or disaster, it has not arisen from the physical weakness of the soldier, but from the mental weakness of commanders. When this question was last debated, the hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Dr. Lyon Playfair) gave us a great many figures, and brought Dr. Balfour, of the War Office, to his aid. Dr. Balfour is a very accessible gentleman, and I, too, have had the advantage of an interview with him. I will state the broad facts of this case, and they have the support of his authority. From 1860 to 1865, a period during which these Acts were not in force, there was a remarkable decrease of disease at the military stations. From 1865 to 1868, when the Acts were generally in force, there was no diminution of disease. The figures for the year 1869 have not been given to the public; but the hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh obtained them from the War Office, and made use of them in his speech. Dr. Balfour considers that they show some favourable results from the Acts. I will state, on his authority, what those results are. In some of the stations where the Acts are in force there is a considerable diminution of disease in the year 1869; but in some of the stations where the Acts are not in force there has been a considerable diminution. The difference is this—that in scarcely any of the stations, under the Acts, has there been any falling back; but, in some of the stations, not under the Acts, there has been a falling back. The comparison is here made between stations where there is ample hospital accommodation, and stations where there is none. What we contend for is—that if in the stations, not under the Acts, there were hospital accommodation where persons could voluntarily resort for treatment, the comparison might show that these Acts were worthless in a sanitary point of view. I shall be told that the voluntary system was tried, and that the desired results were not obtained; but it must be remembered that no results are claimed even for the compulsory system until the year 1869. The greatest hospital created by these Acts is the Albert Hospital, of Devonport. Mr. Wolferstan was the house surgeon for five years ending December, 1869. He is a gentleman of character and ability, and he kept the most elaborate accounts of the women who entered and re-entered that hospital. I shall give to the House some information with which he has furnished me. In 1867, the number of admissions for each woman was 1·21; in 1868, 1·71; in 1869, 2·07. These figures show that in each succeeding year, under the operation of these Acts, the women are more frequently diseased. The supporters of these Acts are bound to admit that inference, or to assent to another view of the case, which is suggested by the mode in which they obtain the Government money. The hospital receives from the Government £30 a year for every bed which is occupied, and £9 a year for every bed which is empty. Are the women then more frequently diseased, or, deprived of every civil right, are they forced into the hospital to satisfy the greed of its managers? Or, again, is this strange result obtained from the fact that the police surgeon is a man who, having been 20 years in the Navy, has never before handled a speculum in his life, and is, therefore, entirely ignorant of the duties to which he has been appointed? The hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh said that this compulsory system had changed the character of disease, and that the Government women were cured in very much less time than those who, in other places, resort to voluntary hospitals. Is he not aware of the fact that in other places there is very limited accommodation, and that, therefore, only the worst cases are taken, whilst the registered women are forced into hospital, some diseased, some suspected of disease, and some not diseased at all. I again quote some remarkable figures from Mr. Wolferstan. From September, 1867, to December, 1869, 566 women were liberated at the Albert Hospital, Devonport, after a detention varying between 1 day and 10. The details are as follow:—Two women were liberated after 1 day's detention, 12 after 2, 17 after 3, 28 after 4, 46 after 5, 101 after 6, 97 after 7, 64 after 8, 108 after 9, and 91 after 10. Have these women been unjustly imprisoned, or does medical science attain more rapid results in these prison-hospitals than elsewhere? In a vain search for a defence of this legislation we have been told that it effects a great pecuniary saving. In the Plymouth district, the loss, in time, of soldiers, sailors, and marines, for the year 1868, was 120 men. If we reckon these at £60 per head, we get a sum of £7,200; but the annual cost of the hospital, the police surgeon, the spies, including, of course, interest of money invested, amounts to a larger sum. But I am not going to argue this case only on the level on which it has been placed by the sanitary reformers of this House. Human beings have some feelings, some rights too sacred to be subordinated to these boasted sanitary results. A voice is heard from the country—a voice which is growing louder every day—asking for a restoration of those safeguards to personal security which have been handed down to us from generation to generation, and which, until now, no Government, either Liberal or Tory, has ventured to invade. The demand is made that though vice may be difficult to diminish, and impossible to repress, the State shall not become a partner in it; and, further, that whatever law shall be directed against the propagation of this disease shall be an equal law, and not have in it the cruelty and the cowardice of attacking the weak and letting the strong escape. How are these boasted results obtained? By what process does this law work? You begin by letting loose spies upon a town. There is no street nor square, no precinct of the town, be it field or garden, over which the eyes of these men do not range. They resort to the basest means to entrap their victims. They are not instructed to dog the steps of men and women—only of women; and not of all women. Their attention is specially given to the poorer and more defenceless class. Milliners, shop girls, women in domestic service—those classes which more commonly furnish the victims to men's lust, these are they who are placed in peril, and whose steps are tracked day and night by the creatures of this law. The House is aware that the Act professes to be directed against common prostitutes. The Act, however, contains no definition of this term. I believe there is a definition in the Police Act. The term there implies women who are seen soliciting in the street. The operations of those who carry out the Contagious Diseases Acts are limited by no such definition. Poor men's houses are entered, women suspected of incontinence, but who are in no sense common prostitutes, are forced into this vile slavery. I was recently asked by a man of position in London whether I thought poor women were as sensitive on these matters as women of a higher class. Sir, until that hour I never felt so much sympathy with the efforts of working men to obtain direct representation in this House. Here is a law passed by Peers and Prelates in one Chamber, and by an assembly of rich men in another, the whole burden of which is directed against the poor women of the country. It is the most indefensible piece of class legislation of which I have any knowledge. How are these Acts carried out? Their victims are not brought into Court and fairly judged. There is a provision by which they can be made to sign what is called a voluntary submission. Women frightened by the police are induced to sign their names or put their crosses to a paper of the meaning of which they know nothing. Every kind of cajolery and fraud are resorted to to obtain the signatures of ignorant and defenceless women. When once they have committed themselves they are subjected to forced examinations every fortnight, and have upon them a brand which makes a return to decent life almost impossible. I say their signatures are obtained by fraud, and if I am not misinformed, the War Office itself is a party to that fraud. Among the regulations issued by the War Office, on the 1st December, 1869, is the following :—

VOL. CCIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

U

"Should any woman object to sign, she is to be informed of the penal consequences attending such refusal, and the advantages of a voluntary submission are to be pointed out to her."

Now, Sir, there are no penal consequences attending such refusal. A woman who refuses to sign can only be summoned before the Bench, where she has the opportunity of showing that she is not a common prostitute. Then, Sir, we have the examining house. I will not undertake to describe that disgraceful institution, but will leave it to the imagination of those who now hear me. I will simply say that women who are young, women who are not young, those who are hardened in vice and those who are barely past its threshold, are driven up to this examining house, herded like cattle in a pen, waiting for the ordeal which a Parliament, representing only men, has prepared for their victims. There is a clause in the Act of 1869, I believe it is the 3rd clause, which exhibits in the extremest way the injustice and indecency of this system. I will refrain from any further reference to it, and I am glad to be told that the authors of the Act are themselves ashamed of it, and would be more at ease if it had no existence. After having spoken of the sanitary, let me refer to the moral results of this legislation. Is the House aware that great moral results spring from this system? The first Act did not pretend even to aim at moral results. It was only when the Members for Oxfordshire and the Tower Hamlets assailed the Act that the flimsy veil of morality, as it was called by the Member for the Tower Hamlets, was thrown over it. From what part of the system do these moral results flow? Do they come from the examining house? Are they assisted by the operations of the police surgeon? The Blue Books teem with evidence to show that when the soldiers were subjected to this ordeal the morale of the Army was lowered, and it was discontinued because both soldiers and surgeons revolted at it. The moral results are said to come from the hospital. We are told that by forcing women there an opportunity is afforded of teaching them religion and of applying to them the chaplain. I see before me my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall); he has had something to say in his time about the State-teaching of religion. What will he say of this new phase which it has taken? How will he regard a plan for forcing people into hospitals, in order that they may be taught religion? Let me ask upon what principle all this proceeds? If it be right to drag women into hospitals in order to administer the chaplain to them, might it not be right to confer a similar benefit on other portions of the community, not excepting even some of those who have helped to pass these Acts? Let me discuss now, for a moment, the statements so repeatedly made, that by the operation of these Acts women are often reclaimed and restored to a respectable life. These statements are entirely unfounded. We are told that there were 1,755 prostitutes in Devonport and Plymouth, and that they have been reduced to less than one-half. Mr. Frederick Wreford, chief superintendent of police at Plymouth, denies the whole of this statement. Mr. Lynn, the superintendent of the Devonport police force, says he does not know of one case of reclamation through the operation of the Acts. Mr. Norman, the secretary to the Albert Hospital, Devonport, says—

"I think there are no grounds whatever for thinking that the total number of prostitutes is lessened."

Mr. Wolferstan states that, during the 18 months ending March, 1865, when the voluntary system existed, 28 per cent of the women admitted into hospital were reclaimed, while, during the period from April, 1865, to December, 1869—when the Acts were in force—only 13 per cent of the women were reclaimed. There is nothing surprising in this result, for anyone who knows anything of human nature will admit that women who are suffering under a sense of injustice from brutal treatment and forced detention, are not likely to be influenced by those who are placed over them. The question is asked—"Is prostitution legalized?" Of course it is legalized. Until now everything that has been done by Parliament has been with a view of repressing it. The law has changed sides on this matter. We have entered into partnership with the brothels. We do the sanitary part of the business for them, and from all accounts we are not doing it amiss. A superintendent of police, Mr. Mallalieu, says—

"Since the passing of the Act, the greater cleanliness of the brothels is something very remarkable."

So long as there are brothels I have no objection that they should be clean; but I maintain that this result should be accomplished on the voluntary principle. I protest against the State being employed to secure this advantage. We are told, too, that "valuable information" is obtained from the heads of these houses which is of great service in carrying out the Acts. In fact, we have established an intimate alliance with these persons, and the great Departments of the State are in terror lest it should be disturbed. The hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh spoke of the altered character of the unfortunate girls. I understood him to say that they were healthier, cleaner, better dressed, and more attractive. It would be a remarkable thing indeed, if, when the State brought its great resources to bear upon an institution like this, it did not render it more attractive. Our opponents are disturbed when they are told that they have planted the French system amongst us. If it be not the French system it is something very like it. So far as I have been able to compare the two, I believe ours to be the more brutal. It surrounds its victims with fewer safeguards, and subjects girls to slavery at a more tender age. I believe, the last time this question was discussed, somebody stated that the certificates were given up. If so, the change was made to meet the exigencies of the debate, for Mr. Cooper, of the Rescue Society, told me that he had recently been accosted by two girls, at Blackheath, who had their certificates. He bought one of the certificates, the other he could not buy, and the girl said that a man came to her every Saturday night and paid her rent, and that without that certificate he would not come near her. I do not know whether it be true or not that these certificates are given up; but if this system be in any way justifiable they ought not to be given up. If the Queen's Government, if the Imperial Parliament undergo the unspeakable humiliation of allying themselves with this system, if the British taxpayer is called upon to support it, then, I say we are entitled to enjoy the results of this expenditure, and both the soldier and the civilian should be enabled to distinguish the instrument which has been prepared for their use from that which would subject them to danger. Why is this law applied to women only? We are told that it is a sanitary law. It is the first time in our history that we apply a sanitary law not to disease in general, but only to the disease of one sex. It is said that you cannot catch men. This is equally true of women. Although you endanger the security of all, you only catch the more notorious. There is always a large outlying fringe of clandestine prostitution which baffles the efforts of the police. The same state of things would be found if you assailed men. Instruct your spies to track the steps of men. Let them be able to tap a man upon the shoulder and ask him to sign a voluntary submission. If he refuse, let him be summoned before the magistrate, give him what you give to women, the luxury of being—I will not say tried; there is little or no trial—but of being condemned in secret, and I undertake to say that you will have no difficulty in laying your hands upon the more notorious class of male propagators of disease. The right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown is not present to-day. I know that it is not his habit to be here on a Wednesday. If he had been here I should have called his attention to the fact that under these Acts women are subject to nine months' confinement,

whilst men in precisely the same condition go absolutely free. I should like to have been able to have asked the right hon. Gentleman whether this legislation squared with his sense of justice. The hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh said that we had a standing Army, of which 90 per cent were celibates, and that they must be protected. This means that a standing Army of men requires an accompanying army of women under Government regulation. Let this be freely admitted, and I believe that standing armies, the great curse of modern times—that institution which inevitably leads to war and all its horrors, would occupy a less secure foundation among us. The hon. Member told us we were standing in the way of a beneficent discovery in science. The examining house, with all its accompaniments, may, indeed, to some minds represent a scientific triumph, but what we have here is at least no recent discovery; it has existed for generations in Continental countries; it has done more to demoralize society there than any other institution that can be named, and there is not one tittle of evidence to show that this country is less healthy than others which have long been subject to this “beneficent legislation.” The hon. Member seems to me to be ignorant of the people for whom he has been sent here to legislate. The tone of his speech reminded me of an answer which was given by a surgeon who was examined before the Parliamentary Committee. The surgeon was asked whether he thought these Acts might safely be extended to the whole country? He said—Yes; he believed all hypocrisy on this subject was now gone, and that the people would accept the Acts. These gentlemen forgot in their calculations one portion of British society not wholly without influence. I mean the women of this country. These men seem to think that the women of England can look on and be at peace, while successive Governments of England are setting their seal upon, and to all appearances contentedly accepting the perpetual degradation of their sex. I am told that these Acts are the work of pious and well-intentioned men. I do not deny it. There are men in this House who support this legislation for whom I have a great respect; but let it be remembered that history teaches us no more frequent lesson than this—that the most indefensible things, the greatest crimes against humanity have been committed by pious and well-intentioned men. Some of the worst things that have ever been done in this country, have been done by Liberal Governments, because the people do not suspect them. It would not have been in the power of the right hon. Gentleman who leads the party opposite to have placed this law upon the statute book. Whether this legislation be good or bad, the First Minister of the Crown and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War are more responsible for it than anyone in this House, because they have been influential members of every Cabinet which has sanctioned these Acts. I should advise the whippers-in of the Liberal party to consider the political aspects of this business. A party is being formed in every town in the country which will subordinate all politics to the repeal of these Acts. Men are saying everywhere, if this be Liberalism, then henceforth there is no Toryism of which we need to be afraid. Leading men on the opposite Benches have had their full share in this business; but, at a future election, their agents will not be slow to ask who passed the hateful Contagious Diseases Acts? and the answer must necessarily be, they were passed by Liberal Governments. Before sitting down, let me consider for a moment what was the real course which Government ought to have taken to meet the evil in question. They should have established voluntary hospitals. I shall be told that the voluntary system was tried, and did not produce satisfactory results. It should have been more fully tried, and tried for a longer period. During a period of two or three years it is evident that the compulsory system did not produce the results that were anticipated. Then, Sir, the sanitary arrangements for the Army and Navy should have been improved. I could show from the Blue Books that the men do not possess the ordinary requirements of civilized life, and that they are in some respects scandalously neglected. The Government should have taken a leaf out of the book of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). They should have protected the soldiers and sailors from the consequences of the unrestricted sale of liquors. This they might have thought too arbitrary a proceeding, although it is not considered too arbitrary to subject women to the most degrading treatment, and to deprive them of every right. The questions of employment and of greater facility for marriage should have received the earnest consideration of the Government. In short, through these various paths I have no doubt whatever that far greater sanitary results are to be obtained than can ever come from the revolting system which the country all but universally condemns. I will sit down by saying in one word that I believe it is not in the power of Parliament to maintain these Acts. There is no place in the United Kingdom where a public meeting can be called together to defend them, and any Government which undertakes to support them will render itself hateful to the people.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that when he entered the House that day he had no intention whatever of taking part in the discussion, but having listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), especially to that part of it which related to the results of the Albert Hospital at Devonport, he could not remain wholly silent, seeing that, while acting as Secretary to the Admiralty, he had personal knowledge of the details of the working of that institution. The hon. Member for Manchester had challenged the House on two points—first of all he had denied the beneficial workings of the Act; and, secondly, he had denied the moral benefits flowing from it; but he hoped, before sitting down, to give a categorical answer to the hon. Member on both of those questions. Before entering into the matter, however, he wished to express the astonishment with which he had heard the hon. Gentleman complain of the want of publicity in the columns of the newspapers for the views of those who were opposed to those Acts. He must ask the hon. Member what he meant by such a complaint as that. So far from there having been any insufficiency in the degree of publicity given to those views, on the contrary, he deeply regretted the extent to which their publication had been carried, and also the manner in which and the means by which it had been accomplished. For the last few months every day and every hour respectable households had been invaded by pamphlets and statements couched in the most filthy language and containing the most indecent details. Talk, indeed, of the want of publicity—he knew, as a fact, that in the county in which he himself lived (Sussex), the drawing-rooms and breakfast-tables of the wives and even the maiden sisters of the most respectable families had been deluged with publications which deserved no other fate than to be brought under the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act. Another complaint of the hon. Member, to which he had listened with equal astonishment, was that those Acts had been passed without any debate in that House. Whose fault, he would ask, was that? When those Acts were introduced they went regularly through all the various stages, through which all other legislative measures passed, in the ordinary course. Nay, more, whereas in other instances when a Bill had received the sanction of both Houses of Parliament the principle of that Bill was not, in general, again raised for discussion; in the present case, on the other hand, an opportunity was annually given for challenging the principle of these Acts when year after year both the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty asked the House to vote the sums of money required for carrying the Acts into operation. Therefore, the opportunity afforded for discussing the principle of those Acts was far greater than existed in the case of any other legislative enactment. He now came to the beneficial working of the Acts, which the hon. Member for Manchester had denied, quoting some figures given by Mr. Wolferstan, the house surgeon, to prove that, during a certain period, the number of women admitted to the Albert Hospital at Devonport had increased, and from that, forsooth, the hon. Gentleman proceeded to argue that prostitution in that town had increased. He begged to assure the hon. Member for Manchester that he had taken an entirely erroneous view of the inference to be drawn from those figures, the truth being that the increased number of admissions was owing to the increased knowledge spread among those unhappy women of the great benefits which would accrue to them from being treated in that hospital. The hon. Gentleman also denied that those Acts had any result. Now, having himself, when Secretary to the Admiralty, moved for a Vote of money for the erection of the Admiralty wing of the Albert Hospital, he told the hon. Member, from an official experience of three years, that the reason why the results of those Acts had not been more satisfactory and complete was the limited area over which they operated, and the comparatively limited sums which had been expended in carrying them out. The really beneficial effect of those Acts, he contended, could not be properly appreciated from the present system of partial treatment, as that disease required, like all other diseases of the same kind, a policy, so to speak, of stamping-out to be applied to it. He would also mention that at Sheerness, in the year 1867, the Admiralty received official intimation that the disease had then been all but completely stamped out. The hon. Member for Manchester, referring to the Devonport Hospital, had stated that 500 women were annually driven up, forced, bullied, and compelled even by fraud in high places to enter those institutions. Now, he begged leave, speaking from official knowledge, to give his most positive contradiction to that statement, and to say that, so far from force, bullying, or official fraud being required, those wretched women flocked up, anxious to enjoy the benefits of the hospital, and fearful of nothing but the jeers of the companions whom they had left outside. The hon. Member had likewise asked how the treatment they underwent could improve the morality of those women, and whether the examining room was to be regarded as the reformatory. Again he would be happy to give the hon. Gentleman a categorical answer, and to tell him that the most beneficial moral results had been produced by those Acts. Very many of the cases in our seaport towns were those of the lowest and most ignorant class, who, it was found when admitted to the hospital, had been brought up to prostitution as their natural trade. They were grossly ignorant of even the first rudiments of religion, and equally so of any occupation which would enable them to gain an honest livelihood. In that hospital at Devonport those unfortunate women were not only cured of a loathsome disease, but during their cure received the ministrations of the chaplain, were taught those first principles of religion of which when admitted they were supremely ignorant, and were practised in all those kinds of domestic and household work which, when they left the institution, would enable them to earn their living without returning to their former career of degradation. The hon. Member for Manchester had spoken of the policy of those Acts as being a purely Liberal policy. He begged leave to deny that assertion, stating that the First Lords of the Admiralty under whom he had served, and he himself also, as the Secretary of that Department, had cheerfully done their best to carry out the policy inaugurated by Lord Clarence Paget in that matter. Notwithstanding the tempting prospects held out by the hon. Member for Manchester that, at the next General Election, the present Liberal majority in Parliament would be turned into a Tory ascendancy, he, for one, utterly repudiated any support given either to himself or his party on any such grounds as those indicated by the hon. Gentleman, and he only hoped that the hon. Member who was supposed to be then taking shorthand notes of the proceedings of the House would make it known to the public that he, at all events, had disclaimed any endeavour to make party capital out of that question. In conclusion, he had to apologize for intruding upon the attention of the House, and he repeated that he had had no intention of speaking, but he really could not allow the erroneous statements of the hon. Member for Manchester to pass without rising to implore the House to pause in its condemnation of a measure which he believed was calculated to promote the best social and moral interests of the country.

MR. WHITBREAD—

CAPTAIN VIVIAN regretted that the hon. Member for Cambridge had not been content to let this disagreeable subject be considered by the Royal Commission, which was to be appointed, instead of consuming the time of the House in a useless discussion. As, however, the debate had been renewed it was his (Captain Vivian's) duty, though very reluctantly, to trespass on the time of the House, in order that he might contradict some of the unfounded charges which had been brought against those who administered this Act, and explain the reasons why, in his opinion, this most unpleasant subject had to be dealt with by Parliament. But before he entered upon the question, he wished fully to endorse what had been said by his noble Friend the Member for Chichester as to the reprehensible steps taken by those who were opposed to this legislation. He (Captain Vivian) did not for a moment question the sincerity and earnestness of their motives. But he did question the prudence—nay, more, the decency—of their acts. The hon. Member for Manchester spoke of “Zealots,” and said that they were not remarkable for discretion. There were generally zealots to be found on both sides of a question, and he could not congratulate those who were among the opponents of these Acts on their discretion. He (Captain Vivian) held in his hand the last of the numerous disgusting publications with which hon. Members had been inundated for the last six months. The pamphlet was signed Garth Wilkinson, and, for his part, he had never seen so filthy—he could use no milder term—a production in the English language. His hon. Friend the Member for Bedford had said the Government had made a mistake in bringing in so stringent an Act. They should have been contented, he said, with the voluntary Lock wards which were always full during the time they were in action, and were a great success. Now, his hon. Friend himself admitted they were not a success, inasmuch as some of the unfortunate women were undoubtedly in the habit of leaving the wards before they were well. That was, in fact, the case, and to a much greater extent than his hon. Friend supposed. It was not that one or two left the wards before they were cured; but experience unmistakably proved that when a ship came into port or a regiment into garrison, and these poor women saw their way to driving a thriving trade, they used to leave in shoals, whether cured or not, so that the voluntary wards, so far from being a success, were an utter failure. That being the case, and this terrible scourge being on the increase, it was necessary to do something, and hence the cause of the Act of 1864 being introduced. Hon. Members had said that these Acts were smuggled through Parliament. It was not to be wondered at that Parliament did not like to discuss openly such painful and disgusting subjects; but were they smuggled through Parliament? Why, the Act of 1864 was based upon the recommendation of a Committee composed of Members whose names were as follows:—

“Mr. Spencer Walpole (Chairman), Lord Clarence Paget, Sir John Pakington, Mr. Hennessy, Mr. Hunt, Lord Hotham, Sir James Fergusson, General Peel, Mr. Liddell, Sir Harry Verney, Mr. Aytoun, Sir Morton Peto, Sir John Trelawny, Mr. Kinnaird, Mr. Locke, The Marquess of Hartington, Sir George Grey, Captain Jervis, and Mr. Longfield.”

It would have been impossible to find a more impartial Committee, or one composed of Gentlemen of higher Parliamentary position. The hon. Gentleman proceeded to criticize the proceedings of the Committee of the House of Lords of 1868. He described that also as a partial Committee. It was not his (Captain Vivian's) duty to defend the proceedings of the other House of Parliament; but this much he would say, that a Committee which numbered among its members the names of Lords Ebury and Nelson—names which commanded confidence and respect wherever they were mentioned—could not be open to the criticisms the hon. Member had made. Then, again, there was the Committee of 1869, of which he (Captain Vivian) had the honour to be Chairman, and which was composed of the following Members:—

The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire had, at the beginning of this debate, severely animadverted upon the proceedings of that Committee. He said they were open to two charges—first, that they called no witnesses who were not favourable to their own views; secondly, that they took care to put no questions to the witnesses which were not sure to extract such replies as would be favourable to the views of the Committee. Now, those were grave charges to bring against a Committee of the House of Commons. If they had been made by an hon. Member of less standing and position in the House than the right hon. Member, he (Captain Vivian) would probably have passed them by unnoticed; but when the right hon. Gentleman made them, it was his (Captain Vivian's) duty to notice and repudiate them. It was only enough to point to the names of those who composed the Committee to show how absurd it was to suppose that they would have lent themselves to such an unworthy course of proceeding. But was it the fact that only favourable witnesses were examined? Why, Dr. Balfour and Mr. Simon were examined. To be sure, the first had become a convert to the Act from experience; but when he was summoned as a witness, the Committee had no reason to believe that his evidence would be in favour of the Act; on the contrary, he was the sole dissident from the Report of the Venereal Committee of 1866-7. And, as to Mr. Simon, he certainly did not give very favourable evidence in support of the Act. The right hon. Gentleman should think twice before he made charges which tended to weaken the respect and confidence which the public ought to feel in Committees of that House. And now to the discussion of those Acts and their effect. There appeared to be three objections to them—first, that they legalized immorality; secondly, that they increased instead of suppressing vice; thirdly, that innocent women were exposed to insult. With regard to the first objection, it would not be necessary for him to say much, as his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh had so fully gone into and answered that branch of objection; but this much he (Captain Vivian) might be allowed to say, that those Acts no more legalized prostitution than compulsory vaccination legalized small-pox, or than putting a drunken man in the lock-up legalized intoxication. The religious objection to the Act—namely, that to attempt by legal enactment to suppress a disease which was meant by Providence as a scourge on dissolute men—was neither new or surprising. It was raised when Jenner invented vaccination, and when the use of chloroform to suppress pain was first introduced. It had always been, and would probably continue to be, raised against all efforts at legislation of a similar character. In addition, however, he must be permitted to remark that some of those whose lives were dedicated to the improvement of morality—he referred to clergymen of the Church of England and others—and whose experience of the working of those Acts qualified them to give an opinion on the subject, held very opposite opinions to those of the hon. Members for Cambridge and Manchester. He held in his hand letters from various clergymen, extracts from some of which he would read to the House. The Rev. L. H. St. George says—

“I have the honour to remark that the general conduct of the girls during the quarter has been very satisfactory. They have not only been steady and attentive during service, but evinced an earnestness which has been most gratifying.”

The Rev. G. Dacre says—

“Of the beneficial working of the system there cannot be a doubt. The girls came into the hospital turbulent, lawless, and godless, and it is astonishing the change that a few weeks produces in them. In many instances they would give up their profession, and remain in the hospital until they had proved the sincerity of their resolutions if they would be allowed. . . . Mrs. Brown's (the matron's) method is so judicious that, after a short residence, the poor creatures are apparently perfectly contented and happy.”

The Rev. J. F. Burlton says—

“There can be little doubt left in the minds of those who have watched the working of this Lock Hospital, that the benefits are beginning to be appreciated. There is a general acknowledgment that the conduct of the prostitutes in and about the town of Aldershot is less indecent, and their habits more quiet and sober than before its establishment. Inside the hospital they submit to the steady discipline of the place, and in most instances express their gratitude for the kind treatment they receive. During the last quarter 23 women have expressed a determination to lead a different sort of life. Nine at their own request, earnestly made, have been sent to asylums, and 14 to their friends.”

The Rev. H. Everett says—

“My opinion has been formed by six years' work as a clergyman in Devonport. I have myself married women to respectable men, who have declared to me that the turning-point in their lives was the time of their residence in the Royal Albert Hospital. I am perfectly certain that we have done, and are still doing, a great and good work within the walls of our hospital. A great deal has been said here about virtuous women being arrested and examined; this, if true, would be a horrible thing, and to be avoided at any price. Here, again, I have taken a good deal of pains in a quiet way to gather reliable information, and am convinced that here there has been gross exaggeration. I cannot find—nor can I hear of anyone else who can find—a single true case where a modest woman has been arrested and examined. Since the operation of those Acts I am certain that the number of prostitutes has greatly decreased in Devonport; that disease and suffering are much less rife among them; and I am also quite certain that very many women have been entirely reclaimed, and have altogether abandoned their vicious life in consequence of the teaching and advice they have received during their stay in the Lock wards.”

Another clergyman, of considerable experience, says—

"I have good reason to hope that many who have been brought to the hospital by the police officer have seen, during their enforced seclusion, the error of their ways, and have been really and permanently reformed. I speak, however, with no certainty, because time alone can settle the question. The whole question is involved in difficulty; but I at present think that this terrible disease needs a most potent medicine, that something must be done; and that the Act in question, although not perfect, is a step in the right direction, and is worthy of painstaking support and a patient trial."

And with that he would dismiss that part of his subject. He next proceeded to discuss the second objection to these Acts—namely, that they tended to increase vice. His hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge said that he based his objections on higher grounds than mere statistics, and that he repudiated statistics. But in discussing such a matter as this it was impossible to ignore statistics; and he (Captain Vivian) thought he could show to the House by statistics that, so far from "increasing vice," the direct tendency of these Acts was to diminish vice, and that their effect had been as satisfactory in a moral as in a physical point of view. First, as regarded the increase or decrease of disease among soldiers and sailors in the protected districts. He (Captain Vivian) held in his hand a Return of the percentage of disease in the Army and Navy for each of the years the Act had been in operation—

"31st December, 1865, 22·68; 31st December, 1866, 18·87; 31st December, 1867, 18·00; 31st December, 1868, 12·19; 31st December, 1869, 11·06."

That Return showed clearly that disease of this character had in five years been diminished by one-half. The hon. Member for Manchester said that in those countries—namely, France and Belgium—where acts of a similar character had existed for many years, the health of the soldiers was, notwithstanding, worse than in our own Army. He (Captain Vivian) had obtained a comparison between our Army and the two other armies which had been referred to—

"The average loss of days' service in Home Stations of English Army is equivalent to seven days loss of service of the whole Army in a year. France loses four days; Belgium three days. 1862—Before the Acts were in operation our Army lost eight days."

But what did medical officers say on that subject?—

ALDERSHOT.

Medical Officer, 35th Regiment.

"Venereal affections, which are little more than half the number returned for 1868, notably diminished during the period the troops were quartered at Aldershot, the existence of a Look Hospital being conducive to that result."

PORTSMOUTH.

Medical Officer, 25th Regiment.

"The percentage of admissions for venereal during this year has been much less than the prior year, owing to the better working of the Contagious Diseases Act."

WINDSOR.

Medical Officer, 3rd Battalion Grenadier Guards.

"It is gratifying to be able to state that since the arrival of the Battalion at Windsor a marked exemption from this disease has taken place, owing, doubtless, to the successful working of the Contagious Diseases Act, affording ample proofs of its good effects."

So far, then, as the effect on the health of the Army went, it was clear that those Acts had been eminently successful even in the short time during which they had been in operation. Now let them see how they worked as regarded these unfortunate women—

"The number of women coming within the provisions of the Contagious Diseases Act from its first coming into operation has been 7,766. Of these, 2,658 left the districts; 385 were married; 451 entered homes; 1,249 were restored to friends; 107 died; total 4,750—leaving 3,016 still on the register."

That could not be considered but as a most satisfactory Return, for the moral effects of this Act appeared from it to be not less important than the physical. The numbers of those poor creatures had not only diminished, but a large percentage of them had been reclaimed from their life of sin and restored to their friends; and those beneficial effects were not confined to one or two of the protected districts, but extended in pretty equal proportions over all, as the following Return showed:—

"Number of women in the under-mentioned districts since the Act came into operation till the present time:—

	Registered.	Now on Register.
Portsmouth .....	1726 .....	695
Devonport .....	2394 .....	645
Sheerness .....	256 .....	52
Chatham .....	692 .....	325
Woolwich .....	703 .....	191
Aldershot .....	778 .....	328
Windsor .....	145 .....	52
Shorncliffe .....	270 .....	122
Colchester .....	172 .....	81

The remainder of the towns only came under the operation of the Act this year; but yet there is a diminution of prostitution even in them. They are—Greenwich, Winchester, Dover, Canterbury, Deal, Maidstone, Gravesend. The balance between those originally on register and those remaining is accounted for by those who have left the district, or married, or entered homes, or restored to friends, or died."

And even among those poor creatures who still continued their pitiful career, there was a marked improvement in their general habits. Captain Harris wrote on that point as follows:—

"The improvement that has taken place in the persons, clothing, and homes of the common women, as regards cleanliness and order, is most marked. Many of the women formerly looked bloated from drink, whilst others were greatly emaciated, and looked haggard through disease. Their language and habits are greatly altered. Swearing, drunkenness, and indecency of behaviour have become quite exceptional. The women now look fresh and healthy, and are most respectful in their manners; in fact, these poor creatures feel that they are not altogether outcasts from society, but that there are people who still take an interest in their moral and physical welfare."

The hon. Member for Bedford said that there was one part of this great social evil which these Acts did not, and could not, reach. He described it as the "broad border" which surrounded those poor creatures who lived only by a life of prostitution. He (Captain Vivian) owned frankly and freely that this was a great difficulty, and one that neither these Acts, or any other, could fully grapple with. But even here they found that indirect benefits arose from the Acts, for Captain Harris reports that—

"Clandestine prostitution, particularly amongst married women and servant girls, has much diminished; this, in all probability, proceeds from the fear of being brought under the operation of the Act."

One other evidence he would produce to show that prostitutes had largely diminished in numbers in protected districts.

He (Captain Vivian) found that the prostitutes in the three towns of Devonport Stonehouse, and Plymouth had fallen from 2,020 in 1865 to 650 in 1869, and the houses of ill-fame, from 410 in 1865 to 125 in 1869—in short, a whole street had been swept away. The hon. Member for Manchester had cited Dr. Balfour as not being very favourably disposed towards these Acts, and he had quoted some figures of Dr. Balfour's in support of that assertion. He (Captain Vivian) held in his hand evidence contained in a Return, lately received from Dr. Balfour, contrasting the protected with the unprotected districts, which threw quite a different light on this subject—

This Table shews—

1st—That the reduction effected by the Contagious Diseases Act has been in the amount of Venereal sores, or that form of disease which is likely to be followed by constitutional mischief. The amount of Gonorrhœa has been very slightly affected.

2nd—The reduction in the admissions by primary Venereal sores has been steadily progressive at the protected stations, while no such decrease has taken place at the other large stations—on the contrary there has been, in the last two years, a slight increase.

The reduction in 1866 may have been in some degree due to the Act of 1864 having been in force at Devonport, Portsmouth, and Chatham.

The fluctuations at each station may be in some degree the result of the small numbers—the averages are more reliable, the numbers under observation in each year not being under 24,000 men.

He (Captain Vivian) had shown by official Returns that, so far from these Acts having the effect imputed to them—namely, to increase vice—they had exactly an opposite effect. Disease had decreased—the numbers of prostitutes had decreased very largely—many had been reclaimed from their life of sin and restored to their friends—houses of ill-fame had diminished in numbers. But it might be objected that his evidence being of an official character, was open to suspicion, as it came from those only whose duty it was to administer these Acts. But he (Captain Vivian) held in his hands evidence of a quite impartial nature—evidence of those whose duty it was to watch over the moral and physical conditions of their districts, and who were, therefore, well able to form an opinion whether these Acts had a beneficial effect on their neighbourhood or the reverse. Here was a resolution of the Guardians of the Farnham Union, which was unanimously passed—

“Guardians of Farnham Union, in December last, unanimously expressed their approval of the Act, and their sense of the benefits it had produced in Aldershot and the neighbourhood.”

Of course, he (Captain Vivian) did not bind any guardians who might not have been present at that meeting to that expression of opinion; but those who were present were unanimous in their view. The Mayor of Dover, writing to the Commissioners of Police, under date 16th May, said—“The Act, I consider, has proved most beneficial.” And, lastly, the strongest impartial evidence of the opinion of the gentry and clergy in the neighbourhood of those towns where the Act was in operation, came only lately to the War Office, in the shape of a Petition to the Secretary of War, praying that these Acts might not be repealed. That Petition was signed by the Mayor and ex-Mayor, Head and Assistant-Master of College, an Archdeacon, 13 local clergy, and many magistrates and gentry. And now to combat the third objection—namely, “Innocent women are exposed to insult.” Now, a great deal had been said, both in that House and outside, on that head; and most erroneous statements as to the manner in which those Acts were worked by the police had been encouraged and circulated by the opponents of the Acts—statements of a general character that honest, virtuous women had been frequently accosted and insulted by the police, threatened with all sorts of punishment if they did not submit themselves to medical discipline, &c.; and some had been bold enough to bring forward special cases, mentioning the names of those injured innocents. Every one of those special charges had been met, inquired into, and fully and completely disproved by the authorities; and he (Captain Vivian) held in his hand at that moment the detailed statement and refutation of each case; but as the hon. Member for Manchester had not repeated any of those charges that afternoon, he (Captain Vivian) would not weary the House by reading these Papers. He would content himself by now again openly challenging the hon. Member for Manchester, or any of his Friends, to produce one single instance of any woman having been improperly interfered with. Some hon. Members, and many out of doors, appeared to be under the impression that these Acts were entrusted to the rural and local police to administer, and that any common policeman could at his pleasure arrest any female he saw in the street, and compel her to attend for examination. But that was not so. The rural and local police had nothing whatever to do with these Acts. They were entrusted to a few carefully selected married men of the Metropolitan Police; and he must remark, in passing, that nothing could exceed the tact and discretion which those officers had displayed in administering Acts which he fully admitted required most delicate handling. He (Captain Vivian) would read to the House the number of police in each protected district who were alone charged with those duties—

The power of those men, again, was so limited and controlled, that even were they disposed to be indiscreet, it would be impossible for them to be so without exceeding their powers. For the following were the forms which must be gone through before a woman could be compelled to attend for examination:—1. A policeman charged with the duty—one of those he (Captain Vivian) had enumerated—having satisfied himself that there was good reason to suppose a woman was leading the life of a common prostitute, reported the case to his inspector. He must not speak to the woman, or interfere with her himself. He reports to his inspector. 2. The inspector then inquired into the case, and if he was convinced that the policeman had good grounds for thinking the woman was a prostitute—and those grounds amounted almost to a certainty always before they were acted upon—he (the inspector) gave her notice to attend for medical examination. 3. She was asked if she would sign a voluntary submission, and if she assented she was taken to the surgeon. [The House must bear in mind that all that was done only by the inspector, not by the policeman.] 4. If she refused, the inspector could do no more. His duty then was to report the case to Scotland Yard. 5. The Chief Commissioner then inquired into the matter; and, if he was convinced as to the nature of the life the woman was leading, he ordered her to attend before a magistrate. 6. Even then the woman was not exposed in an open court, because she could attend by deputy—either husband, brother, father, any relative, or a legal adviser might represent her. 7. And it was only after the case had been legally proved that the magistrate ordered her to attend periodical examinations for 12 months. Surely, it was impossible to take stronger precautions against an improper use of the powers of those Acts; and that they were sufficient and satisfactory was proved, he repeated, by the fact that no woman had been improperly arrested under the Acts, and he defied the opponents to prove the contrary. Among the unfair measures resorted to by the “Zealots” who opposed those measures, was that of trying to induce those unfortunates to resist the provisions of the Act; and, to a certain extent, their efforts had prevailed. Lately, and only lately, since printed papers had been circulated, calling on the women in most inflammatory language to resist the Acts, had any disposition to do so been shown. On the contrary, the poor creatures seemed grateful for the kind treatment they received, and expressed themselves so, not only verbally to the doctors or nurses, but in writing also. He (Captain Vivian) held a few extracts, taken at hazard, from many letters received from some of the unfortunates, who had been reclaimed from their life of sin entirely by the gentle treatment and kind advice they had received in the hospital, while under treatment. He would read a few to the House—

"Give my respects to the Honorable the Gentleman the Doctor that was the means of getting me sent home and may God Bless you all for your kindness to me which I will not soon or never forget."

Here is another—

"Please to give my kind Love to all the girls that was in the Hospital an tell them if they knew the Happiness and Comfort there was in the place they would all take a right step and alter their minds from what they had when I left—I return many thanks to every body connected with the Hospital."

A third writes—

"I hope please God I shall soon be able to obtain a situation so that I may be able to do myself some good and to lead a respectable life for the Future and once more to be admitted into good society. please to thank Dr. Barr for all his kindness to me and tell him that we are all very happy and please to give my Love to all the girls that inquire for me in the Hospital. so my dear madam with my very kind regards to you."

Extract of letter from the mother of a girl who had been induced to return home after discharge from the hospital—

"I am very thankful that there ever was such a place provided for such poor things and such kinde friendes as to sende har home to har friendes."

That was the Act which was described as wicked, immoral, brutal, and many things besides. He (Captain Vivian) was sorry to have trespassed so long on the House. He had a duty to perform, and he hoped he had convinced the House that, at least, those Acts should not be repealed, as the hon. Member for Cambridge wished, immediately; but that they should have further trial, and be inquired into by the Royal Commission which was to be appointed. In conclusion, he (Captain Vivian) admitted that that Act aimed only at preventing disease, and did not touch the moral sources of it. But they must deal with the evils by the only means they knew of—namely, those which common sense and medical science suggested. That such means did not strike at the root of the evil, or arrest the passions of dissolute men, were too sadly true. How to do that was a problem which had remained unanswered for ages; and though by that Act they might fail to solve it, they hoped at least that they might, to some extent, improve the moral condition of those who came under its operation.

MR. MITFORD said, that having been associated with many hon. Members and many others out-of-doors for the purpose of maintaining and, when the country should be prepared for it, of extending the operations of the Acts, he wished to say why he thought they did not deserve the abuse which had been so freely lavished upon them. He regretted that the public had been excluded. Nothing could be more revolting than the subject, but legislators must face it—the see-nothing and do-nothing policy which had led to such a disastrous state of things must be given up, and he thought that their constituents ought to receive correct information on the subject. It was for want of this that people were led away by partial statements and one-sided harangues, and petitioned the House to repeal Acts the provisions of which they were imperfectly acquainted with, whilst they knew nothing of the reasons which imposed upon Parliament the necessity of enacting them. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Fowler) adjured the House in the name of common sense, of justice, of morality, to repeal the Acts. As regarded common sense—what was it which induced Parliament to touch the question? It was the almost unanimous opinion of the most eminent medical men that a frightful disease was ravaging the country—affecting not only those who had brought it on themselves, but numbers of innocent persons, and, from its hereditary character, undermining the health of future generations. This opinion was corroborated by military and naval men; by captains of merchant vessels, who clearly saw the vast amount of evil among the large bodies of men under their control. Was it not common sense to interfere? And if it were said that it was only the doctors who cried out—the answer was, that the doctors only knew the gravity of the question. Many a poor man suffered and died—many a poor child was born to a life of misery, and died a premature death. Friends and relatives were not informed of the cause—the doctors alone knew it too well. As regarded justice—justice between the sexes, and justice between what the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) called the silk gown and the stuff gown—those who approved of the Acts had no desire to restrict their benefits; and when the nature of things was altered, when men adopted as a profession, as a means of livelihood, the career of the prostitute, the law should apply to them. As it was, the Committee of 1869 recommended unanimously that periodical examinations of soldiers should be made. As between the silk gown and the stuff gown, they would also like to apply the laws equally; but you could not get at the one; you could not invade the sanctity of a private house; you could at the other, who solicited and walked the streets; and there was no reason why you should not benefit those you could, if you could not benefit all. As regarded morality, he admitted that there were two sides to the question, and that encouragement to vice might be sometimes given by immunity from the effects of vice. On the other hand, it was well known that many women were deterred from adopting a vicious life by the irksome restraints of the Acts—that, in some of the towns under them, there was much less open temptations in the streets—whilst many poor women had been saved by the kindness, the moral and religious teaching given to them in hospital. Statistics showed this clearly. And when they knew that some of the most eminent men in the country, including several Bishops, clergy of all denominations, the leading authorities of our two great Universities, had memorialized Government for extension of the Acts, could it be thought that morality would suffer seriously? With regard to repealing the Acts, he would show the consequence of it by citing the case of “E. H.,” which had been selected by the hon. Member for Manchester as a special case of grievance, and about whom that hon. Member had asked a Question of the Home Secretary some time ago. The answer showed that “E. H.” had been examined as required by the Acts 14 times, had been sent to hospital 5 times, and was in prison because she refused to be examined again. What would happen in repeal of the Acts? “E. H.,” and hundreds of others like her, would be sent out of hospital more or less diseased, and, having no other means of livelihood, would pursue their vocation in the garrison and seaport towns. The House might imagine the consequences. Opponents of the Acts would say—“None but those who sinned would suffer.” But it was not so. The essence of the case of those who supported the Acts was that people as innocent as the hon. Member for Manchester himself, and that children now unborn, might or might not be sufferers. As regarded herself, what happened? You had taken her from a place where her body and soul were cared for, perhaps for the first time in her life—whence she would have been sent at the public cost to her home, if she could be persuaded to go. You let her go from bad to worse. She might by-and-by, driven by want and disease, again apply for relief, when in that state when doctors could do nothing; and the end would be that she would be found some day dying in a garret, or under a hedge, or wherever she could hide her wretched head. This was no fancied picture. Those who knew Aldershot had seen too much of it. Some might remember the letters signed “The Wren of the Curragh” on the same subject. Much had been said about degrading a woman. He ventured to ask, which course was the most likely to lead to degradation? which course was the most Christian? which the most humane? And still, because they supported these Acts, and tried to save poor women from being a curse to themselves and to all about them, to save them in spite of themselves, they were held up to public execration throughout the country, they were threatened—and the hon. Member for Manchester had repeated that threat—with the loss of their seats. They were denounced in a newspaper called The Shield, the organ of their opponents, as—

“Those who, having knowingly made these laws, and are working them in this demoniac style, are monsters who will shortly find England more hot than pleasant for them.”

The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) recommended that there should be hospitals in the towns frequented by prostitutes, but that there should be no compulsion to enter them. This was tried by our earliest Act on the subject, and found ineffective. Women would not come into them till their cases were far gone, so that cure was far more difficult, and often impossible; and, unused to confinement, would not stay long enough to be thoroughly cured, but on the arrival of a new regiment or of a new ship, could no longer be induced to stay. With regard to the appointment of a Royal Commission, it would, under ordinary circumstances, be premature to inquire into Acts not yet in full operation, passed after lengthened inquiries by a Commission, and by Committees of both Houses of Parliament; but, so great was the public ignorance on the subject that—

SETTLED ESTATES BILL—(No. 191.)

(The Earl of Airlie.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Mr. Mitford

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the measure had passed the other House with little opposition, and was there supported by Sir Roundell Palmer—a circumstance which indicated that it proposed no sweeping change in the law. Its object was to enable limited owners to charge their estates, under certain limitations, with the cost of erecting mansion houses thereupon, such charge not exceeding three years' net rental. The principle was already recognized in Scotland in an Act called the Montgomery Act, which had been in operation about a century, and had been found to work well. The Montgomery Act allowed a charge not exceeding two years' rental for the erection or enlargement of a mansion; and a subsequent Act authorized the sale of so much of an estate as was required to carry out improvements. Dr. Hancock, in his official Report on the landlord and tenant question in Ireland, referring to the Montgomery Act, said—

"This is founded on the principle that for a proprietor to reside with his family on his estate and discharge the duties of his position is one of the greatest improvements that he can effect upon it. The Montgomery Act accordingly provides that proprietors building mansion houses and suitable offices may charge, within certain limits, a proportion of the expenses to their heirs of entail. The non-residence of Irish proprietors has been a frequent subject of observation, and it is but reasonable that the provision which was adopted in Scotland to prevent the strictness of entails interfering with the building of mansion houses should be applied to prevent the strictness of settlements producing the same result in Ireland."

Several noble Lords and hon. Members connected with Ireland had expressed a like opinion; and he had also received numerous representations from English landowners, who, from the absence of a mansion and their inability to charge their estates with the cost of erection, were reluctant absentees. Under these circumstances, the Bill had come up from the other House, where it had received very general support. The Bill incorporated the provisions of the "Improvement of Land Act, 1864;" and required that the mansion proposed to be erected or completed or enlarged should be suitable to the estate; the charge which the landowner was enabled to put on his estate in respect of these buildings was limited to three years' net rental. The increased value resulting from the outlay of any sums expended beyond the charge was to be taken into account; and in cases where it seemed doubtful whether the buildings proposed to be erected, though suitable to the estate, would add to the yearly value of the lands, the Commissioners had discretion as to certifying the improvements. Without their certificate the charge could not be imposed. The charge, unlike other improvements, would not take priority over other charges. The Bill extended to England and Ireland, but not to Scotland.

—(The Earl of Airlie.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, as the measure proposed a serious alteration of the law with respect to settled estates, he thought it was important that their Lordships should have an expression of opinion on the subject from Her Majesty's Government. He did not quite concur with the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie) in thinking that the Montgomery Act of Scotland was on all fours with the present Bill. He confessed, however, that he had not had as yet an opportunity of seeing the Bill. His noble Friend had not stated how many years it was proposed to allow for the repayment of the amount expended upon these buildings or improvements.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Law Officers of the Crown approved the principle of the Bill, which had been amply discussed in the other House, and had met with general assent. It seemed to him of the highest importance to hold out inducements to landowners—especially to Irish landowners—to reside on their estates. Admitting that three years' rental was somewhat excessive, and that the statutory declaration of the owner as to the cost would be an insufficient barrier against fraud, he thought the defects of the Bill could be remedied in Committee. He could not see why a principle that had worked well in Scotland should not work beneficially in England and Ireland.

LORD REDESDALE said, that the value of the estate on which the mansion was built should be alone taken into account, and not, as the Bill proposed, that of the owner's other estates in addition; for in the latter case a gentleman who had a large estate in England and a small one in Scotland might erect on the latter a mansion which to his successor would be useless.

LORD CAIRNS said, he could not admit that a law which worked well in Scotland would necessarily work well in England. In Scotland entails were perpetual; whereas in England and Ireland they were broken after short intervals, and in any future settlements such charges as were thought proper could be placed upon the estate. He objected to the principle on which the Bill was founded. Under its provisions there was nothing to prevent the Commissioners from sanctioning a charge for buildings which might afterwards be an incumbrance and injury to the successors. There was nothing in the Bill which gave the persons in remainder any veto in the matter, no matter how extravagant the proposed charge on the estate. He thought it would be much better to leave any question of this kind to be settled by contract between the parties interested. He thought that the Act of 1864 gave all powers that could be usefully required.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, that the interval spoken of by the noble and learned Lord might be as long as 20 or 30 years. The Commissioners would naturally refuse to certify the erection of a large mansion on a small estate. It was provided that this Act should be read with the Act of 1864, which provided for the protection of reversions by the power of appeal to the Court of Chancery.

LORD CAIRNS thought the Court could only intervene when one of the dissenting parties was an infant.

LORD O'HAGAN pointed out that the 18th section of the Improvement of Land Act provided for the intervention of the Court of Chancery in all cases, and the present Bill afforded greater protection to encumbrancers even than that Act. If the principle of the Act was good, why should it not be applied to Ireland? The Act was valued by all economists, and had been productive of great good by giving limited owners the power of carrying out permanent improvements. The Montgomery Act had proved very beneficial in Scotland by inducing the landlords to reside on their estates; and, in the same way, if extended to Ireland, would be a great discouragement to absenteeism. In no country was it so important that the different classes of society should be knit together, and nothing deterred residence more than the absence of mansions. He knew multitudes of instances of very large estates—principalities indeed, producing £30,000 per annum—the owners of which were frequently absent for 50 years, and who, when they did visit, were obliged to go to a miserable country inn, or to the agent's house. Such entertainment did not encourage men to come from luxurious palaces elsewhere. In that point of view the Bill recommended itself to every man who had the prosperity of Ireland at heart.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, it would be presumptuous in him to say what effect the Bill would have on Ireland; but he was convinced the Bill was totally uncalled for so far as England was concerned. It would simply encourage that dangerous passion for bricks and mortar which had involved many persons in difficulty or ruin. The Montgomery Act contemplated an improved rental of the estate; but the building of country houses impoverished a landowner, and there were sufficient opportunities in England of opening the entail and charging the property with improvements.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was glad to hear from the Liberal side of the House the principle enunciated that it was desirable that Irish landlords should reside on their estates. It was not often they heard such sentiments uttered on that side of the House—they might slip out now and then by accident—but when they did they ought to make a note of it with joy. He hoped the Liberal party would adhere to the principle that Irish landlords should reside on their estates; but what had been done to induce them to do so? In the first place, the management of their property had been taken from them—they had been heavily fined in regard to their rents, and Parliament had destroyed the Church to which many of them were attached. These were the inducements held out by the Government to the Irish landlords to reside upon their estates. And did they seriously think they were offering any compensation, or in any way retracing their steps, by encouraging them to build country houses at the expense of their heirs? He agreed with his noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) that the passion for bricks and mortar did not require encouragement. But the question was of much more importance, and he exhorted Gentlemen of the Liberal party, now that the game question and the county jurisdiction question were so much the fashion—and now that other measures were being taken, the direct effect of which was to drive away landlords from their estates and induce them to spend their lives in foreign capitals—to make up their minds on the question of policy whether it was desirable or not that landlords should reside on their estates.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the lecture just delivered by the noble Marquess to the Liberal party was not called for either by their recent policy or by this particular Bill. He would not follow the noble Marquess by re-opening the Irish Church or the Irish land question; but he would remind the noble Marquess that Ireland, under the existing law, had not been generally esteemed a peculiarly happy country for landlords to reside in. A great part of it had been disgraced by outrages, and not only the Government, but many persons in the Conservative party—indeed, the noble Marquess himself—had admitted that there was much in the Irish land laws which was unjust to the tenant, and that this was one of the causes which led to those outrages. It was to restore contentment among the agricultural population, and to restrain and prevent outrage in future, that Her Majesty's Government had adopted their present policy. They believed it would succeed, and if it did, it would encourage the residence of the landed proprietary. The Liberal party was a very large one, and included many with whose opinions he did not agree; but he had never heard that it was characteristic of that party to hold that it was unwise to encourage landlords to live on their estates. For himself, he agreed with the noble and learned Lord (Lord O'Hagan), that it was an immense political and social advantage that landed proprietors should be resident. The Montgomery Act had promoted this in Scotland, and he believed its extension to England, and especially to Ireland, would be very beneficial.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he did not think the Bill was required. It was not difficult for a limited owner to obtain the power of building a mansion on his estate if it were required. A short private Act was all that was required, and he thought that the comparatively small expense of this should not be grudged if it was important to expend in this way a large sum—especially as this procedure gave ample securities to the persons in remainder. The Bill was unnecessary, and would enable persons to indulge extravagant fancies in such enlargement of mansions as might be altogether unsuitable.

LORD ROMILLY said, he doubted the propriety of passing this Bill. The object in view could be met by a slight addition to the Landed Estates Act, enabling the Court of Chancery to authorize the erection of mansions as well as other improvements. He had known many instances of applications by the tenant in remainder to pull down a house built by the tenant for life. The Bill would be likely to lead to litigation.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, that whilst he would admit that there were some objections to the Bill—and, in particular, he thought the power of raising money to enlarge existing mansions inexpedient—still, he believed that there were cases in which the application of the principle of it would be advantageous. It was by no means a revolutionary measure; it was not aimed at the destruction of landed property; its actual object was to enable landlords to reside upon their estates in certain cases. The principle had worked well in Scotland, and no doubt would in this country, and especially in Ireland. As to the objections raised, they could be dealt with in Committee.

LORD LURGAN said, that the expense of obtaining a Private Bill would be a serious bar to a resort to that process by Irish landlords. He thought this Bill would be very beneficial, and should support it.

LORD DUNSANY said, he knew many Irish landlords who were so apprehensive of the results of the Land Bill that for the present, at least, they would be absentees. The Bill ought to authorize the expenditure of money in fortifying houses; for this would be much better than adding to them in any other way.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL—(No. 26.)

(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that it was to all intents and purposes the measure which he introduced last Session, and which was referred, together with a counter Bill proposed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, to a Select Committee. The most rev. Prelate was appointed Chairman; and after some time the Committee reported the Bill to the House; but the lateness of the Session and the press of business prevented his then proceeding with it. Only two or three alterations of any importance were made in the Bill upstairs. In the 32nd clause he had proposed that the Bishop, of his own motion, or, in default of the Bishop, three resident parishioners, members of the Church, might promote the Judge's office—that was to say, institute a suit in the case of any offence against ecclesiastical law. The provisions applied to all offences, whether they related to matters of ceremonial or of doctrine. That clause in the Bill had, however, been amended by the Committee, who limited it, by providing that in cases of doctrine the Bishop alone should have the power of taking the initiative in the institution of a suit, the power of appeal to the Archbishop being given in the event of his refusal. The clauses from 60 to 66 were also struck out by the Committee. They related to the appointment of juries for the purpose of trying issues of fact—in his opinion a very excellent provision, and one which he believed many of the Bishops would be glad to see restored. The 77th clause, in accordance with his proposal, provided that the orders and rules for the conduct of the Courts should be drawn up by a Committee of the Privy Council, including two Archbishops; but it had been altered by the Committee, and now the Archbishops of Canterbury and York were empowered to prepare rules and orders for the regulating the mode of procedure, their officers, records, visitation fees, salaries and other matters. These rules and regulations were to be submitted to the approbation of the Queen in Council. Those were the chief alterations which the Committee upstairs had introduced into the Bill; but it was not his intention, at the present period of the Session, to ask their Lordships to go into Committee on the measure as it now stood. The Bill had been a very considerable time before the House, and he had moved on the 27th of March for certain Returns which he thought would throw light on the whole subject. Of those Returns, some were not presented till a very late period, some had not been presented at all, while others, he believed, had not even begun to be prepared. In consequence of those repeated delays he had been obliged to postpone the question from time to time, and he would now only ask the House to affirm the principle, "Aye" or "No," that in its opinion the state of the Ecclesiastical Courts was such that it required to be remedied. It was in that sense that he now rose to propose the second reading of the Bill. He last year ventured to point out that there were great abuses in those Courts—heavy expenditure, long delays, and a consequent denial of justice. He mentioned that there was a great insufficiency of Judges in legal character and acquirements. That state of things he proposed to remedy by the Bill which he had introduced; but in carrying out that object he had not been by any means so successful as he could wish. He was met at the outset by the objection that the propositions which he made were wholly inadequate in a financial point of view; but, if that were so, so was the whole financial system on which the Ecclesiastical Courts were based at present. He stated that, for the purpose of carrying out his plan, a sum under £30,000 a year would be all that would be required. He had applied to the Registrar General of Births and Marriages, and he found, as he had before mentioned, that on the average of the last 10 years a sum of above £40,000 a year was paid into the hands of the registrars in fees for marriage licences. Other ecclesiastical fees—for ordinations, curates' licences, institutions to livings, and other things, amounted to £20,000 in round numbers, and £60,000 a year, at the very least, therefore, was the money which was paid by the public into the hands of the registrars, for which sum no account whatever was rendered to the public directly or indirectly. These were the figures which resulted from some of the Returns that had been made; but he believed it would be found that the sum actually paid into the hands of the registrars considerably exceeded £60,000. When Lord Cranworth was Lord Chancellor he introduced a scheme for the reformation of the Ecclesiastical Courts which was much more costly than that he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) proposed, and yet he had declared that the sums which were received by the registrars were ample for his purpose, and would even give a large margin. Let their Lordships for a moment consider what a waste of strength and time and money there was in those Courts. On referring the other day to the 58th volume of Judicial Statistics he found that in the year 1868, 15 Judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law had given judgment in 30,451 causes, excluding criminal cases; whereas in the Ecclesiastical Courts, in the same year, 27 Judges had given judgment in only 182 causes, 169 of which were of a most trivial kind. The reform of those Courts had baffled everybody from the time of Lord Bacon to the present day. Lord Cranworth, in introducing his Bill in 1856, used very strong language. He declared that 19 in 20 of the Ecclesiastical Judges were incompetent to perform their duties. He added—

"A Commission appointed in 1830, reported in 1832, and pointed out, as being in an extremely unsatisfactory state, the jurisdiction of the Courts in a great number of matters, and, amongst others, what they called the purely ecclesiastical jurisdiction. They referred to the exercise of jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters, as distinguished from temporal matters, as very unsatisfactory."—[3 Hansard, cxli. 1254.]

And he denounced the procedure in those Courts as cumbrous, dilatory, and expensive. The Bill of Lord Cranworth went further than his (the Earl of Shaftesbury's), because it would have deprived the Bishops of some part of their patronage, while his did nothing of the kind. Lord Cranworth's Bill was thrown out by a majority of 8 in their Lordships' House, and in the majority there were 16 Bishops, all of whom were English; while the Irish Bishops went the other way, stating that they "felt they ought not to allow a regard for their personal or family interests to stand in the way of a reform demanded by the voice of the country." In 1862, Mr. Seymour, M.P. for Poole, writing to The Times, said—

"I recently urged the Government to prepare measures for the next Session of Parliament to remedy the acknowledged abuses I have endeavoured to point out. I have received no written answer, but a verbal intimation that the English Bishops are the obstacle in the way of Church reform; and that, until the majority of them agree upon some practicable measure, the Government will not again run the risk of being defeated by them."

He might, perhaps, be asked why he had taken up the matter? He was not insensible of the great responsibility of the task; but all he could say was, that he had taken it up in the belief that he might be able to effect some good, and to wipe away from the face of the Church a stain which led to the imputation being cast upon her that she was a Church which admitted of no reform, and that she was without order and discipline. He was now satisfied that the present Bill could not be passed; but a very sweeping change must be effected by any measure that was hereafter proposed. For his own part, he was utterly indifferent to the fate of the Bill, though he was by no means indifferent to the principle that a sweeping reform was necessary to remove the great evils to which he had adverted, and to effect this he had made a sacrifice of his own convictions, and almost of his own principles. A noble Friend of his had used the expression "that the Church never stood so well in the affections of the people." He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) felt that he could not concur in that observation. He was quite sure, and every day was strengthened in the conviction, that the Church must put her house in order, for their Lordships might depend upon it that she had not an hour to lose, or an affection to throw away.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he rose to remove a singular misapprehension on the part of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who appeared to think that the opposition of the Bishops was the great difficulty in the way of the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts. On the contrary, he was prepared to thank the noble Earl for his persevering endeavours to cure the evils as to the existence of which all were agreed, and a large portion of the noble Earl's present Bill had been assented to by the Bench of Bishops. It was perfectly true that Lord Cranworth's Bill was objected to by the English Bishops and approved by the Irish Bishops, because it provided a final Court of Appeal, which English Churchmen thought very undesirable, but which Irish Churchmen were willing to accept, because they possessed no Court of Appeal at all. He was sure there was not a member of the Bench of Bishops who would not say that at the present time ecclesiastical discipline and the Ecclesiastical Courts required reform, although they might not, perhaps, be prepared to use such strong language on the subject as the noble Earl. Some of the present defects in Church discipline arose from the provisions of the Church Discipline Act. In the first place, the preliminary inquiry was unsatisfactory, often resulting in a recommendation to the Bishop which carried with it a condemnation which was not deserved. He might here remark, however, that 10 of the Judges in the Consistory Courts were eminent civilians, that five of the offices in those Courts were held by the Queen's Advocate, others by barristers, and only nine by ecclesiastics. No doubt the Ecclesiastical Courts were hampered by many legal difficulties and placed at a great disadvantage, for the reason that, as ecclesiastical cases had during the last 200 years been limited in number, there were very few precedents to guide their decisions; consequently the proceedings were protracted and uncertain, resulting usually in an appeal. He admitted that such a state of things required amendment. Another great defect in the existing system was that it made no provision whatever for the payment of costs. It had twice been his painful duty to prosecute clergymen. In the first instance the witnesses were not believed; and as, of course, the accused person could not be condemned to pay the costs, they had to be defrayed by the Bishop. In the other case the clergyman was condemned and appealed, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council dismissed his appeal without hearing the Bishop's counsel; but, as the clergyman was a bankrupt, there were no effects out of which to pay the costs. Therefore, whether he won or lost, the same penalty was imposed on the Bishop. All these defects were to a considerable extent removed by the present Bill, which made the proceedings more summary and less technical, and professed to provide funds for paying the salaries of officers and the costs. The noble Earl had stated that he should only require about £30,000 a year to carry out the Bill; but he (the Bishop of London) was inclined to doubt whether this would be sufficient. In the first place, it was proposed to give compensation to all existing officers, who, he presumed, would receive sums almost equal to their present salaries. Then it was intended to appoint Judges with large salaries; whereas the salaries of the present Judges were small. There was also to be a fund raised for defraying costs, and the surplus was to be used for Church purposes. These expenses would swallow up not only all the moneys on which the noble Earl relied, but a very large sum besides. The noble Earl provided, however, that if more money was required, in the first instance application might be made to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Now, it was obvious that the granting of a large sum by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would completely derange all their calculations for some years to come in regard to carrying out the work for which they were appointed by Parliament—namely, the augmentation of small benefices. There were several other points in the Bill which he would not refer to now, but which would require very careful consideration in Committee. One or two were provisions which had been altered for the worse by the Select Committee. One of these related to the mode in which the Bishops were to be put in action. It was provided that three inhabitant householders of a diocese might compel the Bishop to institute proceedings in all cases except those relating to doctrine. In cases of ritual, therefore, he would be obliged to proceed on the requisition of three inhabitants. Cases of doctrine were excepted, he supposed, because there was great uncertainty about them. He regretted that the Select Committee had struck out the clause respecting a jury, which the Bishops had agreed should be composed partly of clergy and partly of laymen. The presence of laymen would not only do away with any ground of suspicion, but would prevent a tendency to severity among the clergy when dealing with one who had disgraced their order.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) seemed to think that the English people took a very anxious interest in this matter; but he (the Marquess of Salisbury) did not think this was really the case. The proof of this was to be found in experience. During the last two years the excitement which had prevailed on the question of ritual excesses had very much diminished. Probably the policy of "masterly inaction" might prove the best; but if the edge of the law were sharpened against them, the new party in the Church would be favoured with a sort of martyrdom, which would excite them to fresh extravagances. He would not, however, dream of opposing the second reading of the Bill, for he held that the amount of expense to which the Bishop was now put in cases of prosecution was a disgrace to the English law. He must, however, join with the rev. Prelate in urging a reconsideration of the provision which enabled three inhabitants of a diocese to set the Bill in motion, to stop something that they might consider a practice contrary to the orders of the English Church. Innovations in the manner of conducting service in a parish church, no doubt, formed a grievance for which there should be a remedy; but no one was aggrieved if a congregation chose to set up a Church to their own liking, however extravagant their ritual, except that the clergyman would be amenable to his Bishop if he departed from the ordinary ritual. To give such extraordinary power to any three members of the Church of England in a diocese would tend to produce religious scandal.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, that ample opportunity should be given for discussion upon a question so important as that before their Lordships. If this Bill were passed it would cause an enormous demand on the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission. He deprecated appropriating the fees arising from the sale of marriage licences to pay for the costs, even if they were sufficient for the purpose, which he doubted; and he did not believe Parliament would consent to appropriate funds placed in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the relief of spiritual destitution to put this Bill in working order. He also wished to point out that, although the Bill provided ample means for checking impropriety on the part of the inferior clergy, no provision was made for enforcing the law against Bishops.

The Bishop of London

THE EARL OF HARROWBY protested against the assumption of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that the country was growing indifferent on the subject of Ritualism; and he also objected to his speaking of Ritualists as "a new party" in the Church. Twenty years ago he would not have been understood; they were a growth of late years, avowedly imitating the practices of another Church, and he could not admit the description "a new party in the Church." He hoped that some measure of this kind would pass.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, the Bill, in accordance with its professed object, would materially shorten the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and would confer great benefit not merely upon the Bishops, but upon the members of the Church generally. When the time arrived to consider the details of the measure, the machinery it proposed would require to be somewhat narrowly examined—especially in regard to the financial part, which he believed to be quite unsound. While he admitted that the noble Earl had rendered excellent service in applying a practical remedy for the evil complained of, he must decline to accept all the financial arrangements suggested by his noble Friend.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR observed, that it was only due to the noble Earl to state that Her Majesty's Government were anxious that some measure should pass founded on the same principle as that of the noble Earl's, and that therefore they would support the second reading of this Bill; but, at the same time, they wished to guard themselves against being supposed to accept every part of it as it now stood. For instance, 27 Judges would be an inordinate number, and he trusted that the right rev. Bench would be able to propose some plan to render such a superfluity of strength unnecessary. He also thought that the financial part of the measure required material amendment.

LORD ROMILLY said, he should support the Bill; but he intended to propose certain Amendments in Committee upon the Bill.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he had omitted to state that the Archbishop of Canterbury had authorized him to declare that the measure met with his approval. As to criminous Bishops, he had omitted them from the Bill in his anxiety to consult the feelings of the right rev. Bench.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

GAS AND WATER FACILITIES BILL.

(The Earl of Kimberley)

(NO. 111.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD REDESDALE said, that when this Bill was introduced he expressed an opinion that its provisions ought to be extended so as to enable the various local authorities to provide for the purchase and erection of gas and waterworks. In many cases the local authorities were anxious to buy up or erect gas and waterworks; and it was desirable that this measure should contain provisions for the purposes of facilitating their action in that direction. He was, however, sorry to find that it was impossible to introduce such provisions into the present measure; but he hoped that the matter would not escape the attention of the noble Earl opposite when the proper opportunity arrived for dealing with the matter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY fully concurred in the observations of the noble Lord, and regretted that such Amendments as he referred to could not be introduced into the measure.

House in Committee: Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 222.)

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY BILL.

(The Lord Cairns.)

(NO. 216.) REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD BROUGHAM said, that the Bill entirely excluded from its operation the savings of single women acquired before the passing of the Act. He therefore begged to propose the following Amendment:—In Clause 1, page 1, line 7, after the word "earnings," leave out "married," and in line 8 leave out "after the passing of this Act." This Amendment would apply to the earnings of a poor woman, no matter at what time she had acquired them. But in order to prevent the objection that the introduction of these words would give the Bill a retrospective action, he further proposed to insert the following Proviso:—

"Provided always, That this Act shall not apply to any wages earned before the passing of this Act by any woman married before the passing of this Act."

LORD CAIRNS said, that the object of the noble Lord was to protect the earnings of unmarried women; but the Amendment went directly contrary to the spirit in which the Bill was framed. For the first time the Amendment would create a new kind of property, dependent upon the fact that it was earned; and, if it were adopted, it would be necessary to trace to its origin every sum of money or portion of property possessed by a woman before her marriage. A woman's earnings were her own, and she could do with them as she pleased on the occasion of her marriage. If they proceeded to draw any distinction on this point, they must either say in comprehensive terms that all the property of an unmarried woman should be her own after marriage, or they must give the amplest powers to a married woman, even without asking the consent of her husband, to do with her property as she pleased. With the view of meeting an objection urged by his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) on a former occasion, he proposed to introduce in the 11th clause an Amendment which would enable a man and woman, on their marriage, to agree as to what chattels should be considered the separate property of the woman. This might be done by a few lines on the back of the marriage lines, or on any other piece of paper.

Clause 7 (Personal property coming to a married woman to be her own).

LORD ROMILLY proposed, after the word "intestate," to insert the words "or to any sum of money not exceeding £200, under any deed or will."

LORD CAIRNS said, that having regard to the provisions of other clauses, as well as those of Clause 7, he thought the words proposed by his noble and learned Friend were unnecessary.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE BILL—(No. 212.) (The Lord Chancellor.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD ROMILLY said, he regretted to be obliged to make a few observations on the measure, which he thought was spoilt from mere parsimony. It was the special duty of the State to provide proper Judges for the trial of causes, and they could never secure proper respect for the Judicial Committee of Privy Council unless they had persons sitting on it who earned that respect from the public, and they could not obtain the services of such persons unless they chose to pay them. He felt very strongly on that subject, because it was one of the reproaches of this country that it made a profit out of litigation—that it made a considerable profit out of the misfortunes of persons who were compelled to go to law—which was just as monstrous in principle as if they were to tax, for the support of the police, every man who had his pocket picked or his house broken into. If any of their Lordships would take the opportunity of reading a little tract by Jeremy Bentham, entitled, A Protest against Law Taxes, he should be very much surprised if it did not convince them of the iniquity of a tax upon persons who went to law. He firmly believed that the noble Duke who presided with great ability and zeal over the Indian Department (the Duke of Argyll) was fully determined and very anxious to make the best provision he possibly could for the due administration of the law in India; but this was not the way to accomplish it. On a recent occasion when that subject was before their Lordships, he (Lord Romilly) had ventured to point out that there were two things which ought to be done for this purpose: the one was to improve the legal tribunals in India, and the other was to improve the Court of Appeal at home. The number of appeals from the local tribunals of India to Calcutta reached every year, he believed, about 7,000. It was impossible that the Judges there could hear all those cases, and a greater staff of Judges was absolutely necessary to dispose of them. It was one of the consequences, and also a gratifying consequence, of the good government of India that we had an enormous amount of litigation among its people, because they would not go to law as they did unless they expected to get justice. The increase of legal proceedings in India showed the necessity of providing good Judges there. Now, in order to meet that necessity the position of the Judges must be raised. Then, again, great care should be taken not only that their ultimate tribunal should be able to dispose of the cases which came before it, but that the men they obtained to serve on that tribunal should be such as would inspire confidence among the public and the profession both at home and abroad. To suppose, however, that they could get such men for £500 a year, even in addition to a retiring pension, was, in his opinion, perfectly ridiculous; and, again, the idea that they could secure them for £2,500 was, in his view, equally absurd. They must always bear in mind the great increase in the price of all commodities which had occurred of late years, together with the great increase which had occurred in the remuneration obtained by lawyers. That fact ought not to be lost sight of when they were attempting to fix the salary to be given to a Judge. If, therefore, the proposal contained in that Bill were not altered, he ventured to predict that their Judicial Committee of the Privy Council would not rise in the public estimation, and would not satisfy the people either at home or abroad.

LORD DENMAN objected to the amounts which it was proposed to pay to those who were to be appointed to clear off the arrears of business before the Judicial Committee; for it was not for their Lordships to determine that matter, and in 1831 the Bankruptcy Bill left the House of Lords without any retiring pension being proposed for the Lord Chancellor; but in the House of Commons £6,000 a year was proposed, and the clause was withdrawn, as well as all retiring pensions for the new Commissioners in Bankruptcy, and he believed they might trust to the generosity of hon. Members in "another place" for requiting even those who for years had diminished the arrears in the Privy Council; and if the retiring pensions of those colonial Chief Justices were insufficient, on their declaring that fact, he would act as in the case of retired Ministers, and he had no doubt that the other House would allow full remuneration from the Consolidated Fund for those who had zealously served their country.

LORD CAIRNS said, there was not much use in discussing clauses relating to sums which must be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, as they would have to be struck out before they left that House; but he thought all objections of that kind would be met if the Bill were made a temporary Bill, intended to meet a temporary crisis, which he hoped would not occur again. He would, therefore, suggest the adoption of a clause limiting the operation of the Bill to two years, during which time the arrears of business could be cleared off. He hoped their Lordships would reject the proposition that colonial Chief Justices should be eligible to be members of the Judicial Committee. He thought that no retired Judge should be eligible except the Chief Justice of Bengal. As to the proposition for appointing barristers of 15 years' standing, he would ask his noble and learned Friend if he thought it likely he could obtain the services of such men as were required for this office? It was hopeless to expect that the services of barristers of experience and ability could be secured for £2,500 per annum; or, if they could, the judicial salaries paid in this country ought at once to be reduced by one-half. He was also of opinion that the proposed addition to certain salaries would destroy the present system of voluntary service.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he agreed with what the noble and learned Lord (Lord Romilly) had said as to the impropriety of paying the expenses of a tribunal by levying fees upon the suitors; but that had no relation to this Bill, for there were no fees provided for in it. As regarded the question whether or not the tribunal could be respected unless its members were highly paid, he begged to remind his noble and learned Friend, that the present tribunal, consisting of several unpaid members, had existed for 35 years, and none was more respected. Of course, at times, and especially when it had had to deal with controverted topics of religion, its decisions had been assailed; but, in regard to legal matters, it always had been, and was unassailable. He would also remind the House that the Judge who did most to raise the tribunal to its great emi-sured. There are several points in College arrangements dependent upon this system of tests, and when you remove the system of tests altogether, it will be necessary to inquire whether their place should be supplied, and if so, how?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY asked whether the noble Marquess had his witnesses ready?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he had five, and a noble Friend of his had others. He had received many letters on the subject, showing that great anxiety existed in the country touching the Bill.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked, whether in case the Committee had not finished its labours at the close of this Session, it was the intention of the noble Marquess to move its re-appointment next year? He remembered the case of a Scotch Bill which had been referred to a Select Committee, which came to an untimely end through the absence of the Chairman, who went off to Scotland, leaving his Committee in doubt when he would return, or whether he would return at all; and he feared this Bill would be wrecked by a similar catastrophe.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he differed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) as to the facts of the case referred to, the Bill in question having been lost from other circumstances than those stated by him. In reference to the University Tests Bill, what his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) said was to this effect—So far from desiring to put an end to the measure, his noble Friend expressed a wish that the forms of the House would allow both the Bill and the inquiry of the Committee to be proceeded with. And in the event of the Committee reporting in favour of such legislation, that the Bill should be taken up next Session exactly at the same stage at which it was left in this. The object of his noble Friend was simply to acquire information to justify the necessity for legislation on this important and difficult subject. The statement of his noble Friend, that he wished the Bill to be amended in a manner which he pointed out, should be a sufficient indication that he did not wish to destroy the Bill altogether. He (the Duke of Richmond) certainly did not vote with the noble Marquess with that intent, though he was bound to admit that their success postponed the Bill for this Session; his object was to insure that deliberate action which common prudence demanded.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, as a Member of the Scotch Committee referred to, stated that in that case the Committee met, went into certain matters which had nothing to do with the Bill, and on the next day of meeting the Members assembled on a fool's errand, to find the Duke of Buccleuch, who had moved for the Committee, had gone to Scotland, and there was no reason to believe he intended to return.

Motion agreed to; Committee nominated accordingly.

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

BRITISH RESIDENTS AT BELIZE.

QUESTION.

MR. CANDLISH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If the Colonial Office has received a Copy of any Memorial addressed to Lieutenant Governor Longden by any British residents at Belize, praying for compensation for losses sustained by the irruption into the Colony of Indians under the command of a General in the Mexican Army; the amount of such claims, and if any determination has been come to thereupon; if any redress has been demanded of the Mexican Authorities; and what steps have been taken to prevent such outrages in the future?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said: The memorial referred to by the hon. Member has been received. It is signed by 10 inhabitants of the Northern Province of British Honduras. The schedule of the estimated amount of their respective losses is given as nearly £36,000. Those who have embarked capital in British Honduras must always have known what were the risks to be encountered from the Indians, and that any charge which Her Majesty's Government might incur for the protection of the colonists must necessarily bear some moderate proportion to the population of the Colony and the interests requiring to be protected. The revenue, taxation, and expenditure of the Colony have been exclusively under the control of the Assembly. But the Assembly has refused to contribute any sum towards the military expenditure. My answer, then, to my hon. Friend's first Question must be that while Her Majesty's Government are willing to provide for some portion of the military expenditure, they could not propose to supply from Imperial funds compensation for loss of property exposed by its owners to risks to which they must have known it must be subject. As to the second Question, the steps to procure redress are under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. It is intended to station two companies of a West India Regiment at British Honduras; but the proportion in which the cost of maintaining them is to be divided between the Imperial Government and the Colony has not yet been settled.

NAVY—SALE OF STORES AT WOOLWICH DOCKYARD.—QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether loss has not been incurred by recent sales of Government Stores at the Royal Dockyard, Woolwich; and, in particular, whether, on the 13th June last, "a self-acting curvilinear saw frame" (the recent cost of which to Her Majesty's Government was over £900) was sold for £70; and, that "two wrought-iron paddle-wheel shafts," weighing over 45 tons (the recent cost of which to Her Majesty's Government was over £500), were sold for £16 each; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to continue such a sale of Government Stores?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that a self-acting curvilinear saw frame, which originally cost about £800, was sold on the 13th of June last, at Woolwich, for £70; but the cost of its removal and re-erection will be at least £60, so that £130 will represent the cost to the purchaser. This machine was erected more than 20 years ago, is quite obsolete, and of a type rarely, if ever, seen out of a Government Yard. It was very doubtful whether anyone would bid for it, and the officers were only too glad to get the £70. Two wrought-iron paddle-wheel shafts, weighing, not 45, but 22 tons, were sold for £16 each. They were returned many years ago from the Retribution, and were in such bad condition as to be perfectly useless for any other purpose than as old iron. Considering that all the good machinery had been removed from Woolwich to other yards, and that nothing was sold that was not obsolete and could not be used for the service, very excellent prices were obtained at the public sale there; prices, in fact, on the whole, greatly above the valuation, and which surprised both the auctioneer and the superintending Government officials. I may add that we have been equally fortunate at the sales at Deptford and Devonport, all the auctions having been largely attended, and the stores sold having brought prices exceeding our most sanguine expectations. In many cases the prime cost was approached, and in some even exceeded. The sum paid into the Exchequer at the close of the financial year I expect to be very large, and as everything has been retained which the officers reported might by any possibility be required for the public service, I feel confident that the House will be of opinion that a wise course has been followed.

NAVY—NEW IRON-CLADS.—QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in order to test by actual experiment at sea, the many novelties in the construction and also in the mode of arranging and placing the armament of the four new iron-clad ships of the "Vanguard" class, viz., "Vanguard," "Invincible," "Audacious," and "Iron Duke," it is his intention to send any of these vessels to sea on a trial cruise, or on the next cruise of the Channel Fleet?

MR. CHILDERS: Although I am sure, Sir, that the hon. Gentleman would not generally ask me what particular ships will be put in commission, I appreciate the object of his Question, and I beg to inform him that one of those vessels will be put in commission shortly.

VACANT JUDGESHIP IN CHANCERY.

QUESTION.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask, Whether it is intended to complete the Court of Appeal in Chancery by filling up the vacancy caused by the death of Lord Justice Giffard, by whose death the country had sustained a great loss?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I join in the sentiment expressed by the hon. Gentleman as to the nature of the loss which the country has sustained by the death of Lord Justice Giffard, and it is the intention of the Government to fill up the vacancy which has thus occurred.

INDIA—OLD BANK OF BOMBAY.

QUESTION.

MR. DYCE NICOL said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Indian Government intends to take action upon the Report of the Commissioners' Inquiry into the causes of the failure of the Old Bank of Bombay; and, with reference to the speech on the 27th March 1868 of the then Secretary of State for India, to ask the Under Secretary of State if he will now produce the Minutes recorded by Members of the Council of India relative to the failure of the Old Bank of Bombay?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, my hon. Friend's principal Question appears to point to two kinds of action on the part of the Government—first, as to its policy with regard to the Presidency Banks; and, secondly, as to its policy with regard to the misconduct of certain persons connected with the Old Bank of Bombay. As to the first of these kinds of action, I explained the policy of the Government in answer to a Question of my right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), on the 17th of February last, and I can only repeat what I then said, namely—

"The question for the Government now to consider is whether it should not withdraw from its position as a shareholder in the Presidency Banks, and we have asked the opinion of the Government of India on the whole matter, and especially as to the way in which it thinks our withdrawal could be effected with most advantage to the public and with least inconvenience to our fellow shareholders."—[3 Hansard, cxcix., 428.]

As to the second kind of action, I regret that we have not seen, and do not see, our way to taking effective legal proceedings even against the persons most implicated in the unhappy transactions which led to the fall of the Old Bank of Bombay. We shall not oppose my hon. Friend if he thinks fit to move for the Papers about which he asks.

VENEZUELA—PRUSSIAN CLAIMS.

QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that a Prussian Man of War has lately visited La Guayana, and that in consequence of that visit, or subsequent to it, the Government of Venezuela have paid Prussian claims to the amount of about 50,000 dollars; and, further, whether information has been received at the Foreign Office that the United States Government are about to send ships of war to La Guayana to enforce the claims of American subjects?

MR. OTWAY said, in reply, that no information had been received at the Foreign Office that the Government of Venezuela had paid money over to the Prussian Government on account of certain claims, and he must observe to his hon. Friend that the Prussian Government was not in this respect a creditor of Venezuela. If there were any claims of that character against Venezuela it was on account of the detention of certain vessels; and information had been received from the Acting Chargé d'Affaires at La Guaiaca that three vessels of the Germanic Confederation had visited that port, but no official account had been received of the payment of the sum in question. As to the United States Government, it appeared that Mr. Fish had complained of the unpunctuality of Venezuela in paying her claims; had expressed the intention to insist on the fulfilment of her engagements, and had intimated that unless this was done the Governments concerned might think it advisable to send a few ships of war to La Guaiaca in order to show Venezuela that her engagements were not to be trifled with.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask whether any steps were being taken by the Government to procure the payment of the large sum of money due from Venezuela to persons in this Country?

MR. OTWAY, in reply, said, the Government were taking all possible steps for the satisfaction of all such claims as they believed to be really due.

SPAIN—CHOICE OF A KING—PRINCE LEOPOLD OF HOHENZOLLERN.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HORSMAN: It is necessary, Sir, that I should preface the Question which I have placed on the Notice Paper with a short explanatory statement, in order to make the Questions clear and intelligible; and, I may add, that I should not have put the Questions on the Notice Paper without having previously shown them to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who said there was no objection to their being put. The first Question has reference to the negotiations which led to the withdrawal of Prince Hohenzollern's nomination for the Crown of Spain. It is understood that the King of Prussia made that concession to France very reluctantly, under the advice of other Powers, and that one of those Powers was England—the advice being given, with the sanction and concurrence of France—avowedly in the interest of peace. ["Order!"] I am not going to say one word not strictly within the rules of the House. That object—the preservation of peace—not having been obtained, Prussia, if that nomination had not been withdrawn, and if it had been a cause of war between Prussia and France, would then have been in the position of having Spain for an ally; but now having made the concession of withdrawing the nomination of Prince Hohenzollern, and not having obtained the object of the concession—["Order!"]—I only wish to finish the sentence, and then my explanation will be at an end. I repeat that Prussia, not having obtained the object in view, by the withdrawal of the nomination of Prince Hohenzollern, the interposition of the other Powers had only operated as a cause of weakness to Prussia, inasmuch as it had deprived her of a sure ally. The first Question, then, I wish to put to my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government is, Whether the withdrawal of the nomination of Prince Hohenzollern was advised by England, and conceded by Prussia in the full expectation that by that concession France would be satisfied and war averted; and the second Question is one which in itself requires no explanatory statement. Intelligence has reached this country that within the last few days the Russian Government have communicated to France their disapproval of the declaration of war, and that in the event of war their sympathies will remain on the side of Prussia. ["Order, order!"] What I want to know is, whether any such communication has been sent by the Russian Government to the Government of France, and, if so, whether it was accompanied by an expression of opinion that the determination on the part of France to proceed to war after France had accepted the good offices of other Powers, and Prussia had made the concession recommended by those Powers, was a departure from the general understanding by which the Emperor of the French ought in honour and good faith to have considered himself bound?

MR. A. SEYMOUR said, he would also beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government have any information, other than that furnished by the newspapers, of the existence of a secret Treaty between France and Denmark; and if at any time within the last six months, they are aware that any formal proposal of mutual disarmament has been made by France to Prussia and refused by the latter Power, as stated by certain French and English journals?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard was kind enough to show me in manuscript the Questions which he put on the Notice Paper, and I stated that I thought he might, according to his discretion, put them, and I would give the best answer I could; but the right hon. Gentleman did not mention to me that it was his intention to preface them.

MR. HORSMAN said, that he made the statement to explain the Questions.

MR. GLADSTONE: What I said was that the right hon. Gentleman did not mention his intention to preface his Questions by an explanation in the House to which I now refer; because, though it is, indeed, no part of my duty to refer to the explanation, yet, at the same time, the House could not expect that I should pass it over in silence. With respect to the Questions put on the Notice Paper by the right hon. Gentleman, the first is an inquiry as to the expectations by which the King of Prussia was induced to advise the withdrawal of the Prince of Hohenzollern's nomination for the Crown of Spain. Having considered that Question, I come to the conclusion that we have no knowledge ourselves of the degree in which the right hon. Gentleman's words would be borne out that the King of Prussia was induced to withdraw the nomination of the Prince, nor have we any precise knowledge of the expectations by which the King of Prussia was induced to act as he has done beyond that which is supplied by the Papers to be laid upon the Table of the House to-morrow. My right hon. Friend will then be able to judge whether the answer now given on the part of the Government is a just and reasonable one. With regard to the second Question, relating to the Governments of Russia and Austria, I do not think that we have precise official information of every step taken up to the latest moment by the Governments of Russia and Austria. We have sufficient information to be justified in believing that both those Powers used their best efforts, not only with one but with both the parties to the present unhappy war, in the interest of peace. Then, with regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. A. Seymour), as to whether the Government had any information other than that furnished by the newspapers of the existence of a secret Treaty between France and Denmark, and whether, within the last six months, we are aware that any formal proposal of disarmament has been made by France to Prussia, and refused by the latter Power, as stated by certain French and English journals, I have to say that we have no information whatever on the subject of a secret Treaty between France and Denmark, and have not the slightest reason to believe in the existence of any such Treaty. All the information we have would go to disprove its existence, so far as we are justified in forming a conclusion on the subject. The latter part of the Question I might answer in the briefest terms, for as far as we know no formal representation has been made by France to Prussia for mutual disarmament; but that is not the whole truth, for it is true that communications were carried on through Lord Clarendon with France and Prussia on the subject; but of those communications there was no official record, and as they were carried on confidentially by Lord Clarendon on behalf of both parties, I am disposed to think, even if there had been any official record of them—and in this opinion Lord Granville concurs—that we should not be entitled in courtesy to divulge them.

ARMY—DEPUTY COMMISSARY GENERAL LUNDY.—QUESTION.

MR. DEASE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is his intention to appoint Deputy Commissary General Lundy to be a Deputy Controller over the present Assistant Controllers, whose Commissions in the Control Department are dated the 1st of January 1870; and, if so, whether such a step would not endanger the position of the Assistant Controllers, and be in contravention of Article 12 of the Royal Warrant, dated the 12th of November 1869?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, on the first formation of the Department, Mr. Lundy was appointed Acting Deputy Controller at Jamaica, to introduce the new system there. As the force in Jamaica is to be reduced, Jamaica will not be a Deputy Controller's station; but upon the occurrence of a suitable vacancy Mr. Lundy's services will be transferred to it, and his acting appointment rendered permanent.

Mr. Gladstone

ARMY—RETIREMENT BY SALE OF COMMISSION, CIRCULAR 220, 1862.—QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the Horse Guards Circular 220, of the 2nd September 1862, by which

“No application from any Officer to retire from the Service by the sale of his Commission is, under any circumstances, to be entertained unless the application be accompanied by a Military Medical Certificate of the state of health of the Officer who desires to retire;”

and, whether he sees any good reason why that Order should not be rescinded, and Officers who have contracted mortal disease in the service of their Country should not be permitted to realize the value of their Commissions for the benefit of their wives and families?

MR. CARDWELL: The object, Sir, of the regulation is to secure to non-purchase officers that they shall not be deprived of the intended number of commissions. In 1867 the attention of my Predecessor was called by Captain Hayter to a case in which it was supposed that a sale had been effected in violation of the rule, and he pledged himself to take steps to prevent in future an arrangement prejudicial to the interest of the non-purchasing officers. I am not prepared to depart from this engagement.

ARMY—CAPITATION TO VOLUNTEERS. QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, as to his new proposal for Volunteer Capitation Grant, May any eight out of the Officers and non-Commissioned Officers of a Company earn for it £2 10s. each; if more than eight are sufficiently qualified, will no more be given; is the £2 10s. additional to the 20s. or 30s. earned at present; and, in the case of consolidated battalions, say of eight Companies, will it be enough that any sixty-four Officers and non-Commissioned Officers of that battalion so qualify themselves, and may Field Officers be included?

MR. CARDWELL: The eight officers and non-commissioned officers to whom the power of earning an additional £2 10s. for the corps is intended to apply are the captain, lieutenant, ensign, and five sergeants. It is intended to be in addition to the present capitation grant, so that an officer who complies with the conditions may earn £4. I may add that I have already made arrangements with the Artillery Volunteers for enabling 100 officers and 1,000 privates to go into camp at Shoeburyness, and that I am prepared to consider with the Rifle Volunteers arrangements for enabling a certain number of officers and men of that arm the better to practise in camps.

VOL. CCLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

ARMY—MILITARY LABOUR—REPORT OF COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Committee which he stated last February had been appointed by His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief, composed of competent Officers, to draw up Regulations for extending the system of “Military Labour to Military Works,” have made any Report; and, if so, if he has any objection to lay it upon the Table of the House?

MR. CARDWELL: Before making their final Report detailed examination has been necessary in the different corps to ascertain the qualifications of the men proposed to be established instructors. It is hoped that, when all the Reports have been received, the Committee will be enabled to recommend a system by which every man in the Army who wishes to work at a trade may obtain employment.

ARMY—EXAMINATION FOR DIRECT COMMISSIONS BY PURCHASE.*QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of several young gentlemen at present on His Royal Highness's the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief's list for direct commissions by purchase, who not having attained the age requisite (17 years) prior to presenting themselves for examination on the 25th instant, are precluded from presenting themselves for examination on that day, and consequently will be prevented from ever hereafter receiving a commission in the Army, as by the Horse Guards rule, when all those who shall have successfully passed the coming examination have received their commissions, the new rule greatly limiting the age of future candidates will come into operation, excluding all now on the list who have not passed on the 25th, and whether under these exceptional circumstances, the Secretary of State for War will permit such young gentlemen as are now prepared to present themselves for examination, and are at present on His Royal Highness's list, to be examined on the 25th of July, notwithstanding their not having attained the age of 17 years by that day?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, it is a mistake to say that they are excluded, since the Regulation says—

"Candidates, whose names are on His Royal Highness's list, but who will not be old enough for examination in July next, will remain on the list; but owing to the number who will most probably qualify for commissions, and who will have to be provided for, there will be no further examination for commissions in the cavalry and infantry of the Line for a considerable length of time after July next, before the expiration of which period revised Regulations for examination will be issued."

How soon there will be another examination will depend on the number who succeed at the first, and on the requirements of the Service. Due consideration will be given to those already on the list, who, in case the absorption goes on rapidly enough to create vacancies, will have the first claim.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would beg to ask, If there would be another examination before the new Rules come into operation?

MR. CARDWELL: The new Rules will come into operation after the examination to be held on the 25th instant.

ARMY—STAFF SERGEANTS OF IRISH MILITIA—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having regard to the present condition of affairs on the Continent, he does not think it expedient to reconsider his recent order for the reduction of one-half of the Sergeants on the Staff of Irish Militia Regiments?

MR. CARDWELL: No sergeants on the Staff of the Irish Militia regiments have been reduced. What has been done is this—a rule has been laid down that, until there shall be a prospect of calling out the Irish Militia, on vacancies occurring in the permanent Staff for one sergeant in each company, those vacancies shall not be filled up. The answer therefore, is that as soon as there shall be a prospect of calling out the Irish Militia, the vacancies in question will be filled up.

WATER TO ANIMALS IN TRANSIT.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Privy Council have received any information as to the working of the Order in Council of May last relating to the supply of Water to Animals when in transit by Rail?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, there are now upwards of 300 railway stations in Great Britain at which water is provided, and many others are having the necessary works constructed, so as to provide a supply. There are other railway stations at which water has not been provided, especially in Scotland. In addition, 271 local authorities have already been invited by a circular sent round by the veterinary department of the Privy Council Office to suggest other stations, and the remaining 132 will be communicated with in the course of a few days. As the matter is one of some interest, I may read an extract from the Report of Professor Simonds, respecting arrangements made by the Great Eastern Railway, dated July 7, 1870—

"With regard to the general question of watering animals, it may be stated that almost every station-master whom I saw during the several days of my inspection spoke of the great advantages of the system and the evident benefit derived by the animals from its adoption. Instead of being restless, as heretofore, when in the pens or the reception yards, many would lie down and quietly rest after having had a supply of water. It was further remarked that dealers and persons who had opposed the introduction of the system had now become its advocates, from having had practical proof of its benefits."

NEUTRAL CONDITION OF LUXEMBOURG.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY LYTON BULWER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has received satisfactory assurances from the Governments of France and Prussia relative to their respecting the neutral condition of Luxembourg? He hoped he might be allowed to state, in explanation of his Question, that with respect to the conditions on which the neutrality of Belgium and the neutrality of Luxembourg reposed there was a certain difference. He could have no doubt as to the position in which we stood with respect to Belgium, because each Power had entered into a separate individual Treaty, binding itself to guarantee Belgium's neutrality, so that if one, two, three, or more Powers failed in their duty the other Powers would still be as imperatively bound in honour to do theirs. But that with respect to Luxembourg the Treaty entered into was a collective one. It bound all the parties who signed it; but Lord Stanley stated at the time that if any of these parties violated this joint obligation the question might then arise as to whether its full responsibility would fall on the remaining ones. He did not agree with this view; still it made it very important to know whether Prussia and France, in the present condition of affairs, had declared they would abide by their collective engagement.

MR. HEYGATE asked a similar Question in regard to Belgium.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will answer the Question put to me by my right hon. Friend, but I think the House will agree with me that it is not desirable I should refer to the statement he has made. I should wish, deliberately and advisedly, not to make myself a party to any difference that may arise. But with respect to his Questions I hope the answer I have to give will be satisfactory. I will at the same time answer the Question of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Heygate). There is another country which, though not the subject of European guarantee like Belgium, must necessarily be the subject of very great interest—I mean Holland—and I may state that we have received assurances which are satisfactory in the fullest sense of the word with regard to Luxembourg, Belgium, and Holland. Both the parties to the war have expressed their earnest desire and full intention to respect their neutrality—it being always understood, necessarily and justly, that a country like Belgium is disposed to assert and maintain its neutrality, and that it has not been violated by the other belligerent. It is but fair that I should state that, because I must not give the answer broader than it really is; but I am bound to say it is as broad, full, and satisfactory as could be expected.

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA—NEUTRAL VESSELS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If Neutral Vessels will be interrupted in their trade with France and the North German Confederation; if so, what time will be granted for sailing to and from belligerent ports; within what distance of British and Colonial Coasts and Harbours capture or seizure by either of the belligerent Powers will be considered legal; and, if it is intended to define what Merchandize is contraband of war, in order thereby to avoid many of the complications which arose during the American Civil War; and, if Coal conveyed to non-blockaded ports will be legal traffic?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Questions on the Notice Paper which have been put by my hon. Friend, and two other Questions of which he has given me private Notice, are of very great importance; and I must ask permission to preface my replies with two observations. In the first place, without in the slightest degree finding fault with my hon. Friend in putting his Questions, I must venture generally to express a hope that as far as possible, and for the better security of those who are interested in mercantile transactions affected directly by the war, it is advisable that they should depend on written rather than spoken answers—a written answer being always in their hands for reference and guidance. The other remark I have to make is this—that my hon. Friend will recollect that I cannot pretend to speak with any authority for the conduct or views or intentions of any Government except our own; and with regard to the views this Government take of points of law arising in connection with the position and duties of Neutrals, they must never be understood to lay down rules of law as binding on other Powers, or undertake to speak for other Powers. The first Question of my hon. Friend is—

“If Neutral Vessels will be interrupted in their trade with France and the North German Confederation; if so, what time will be granted for sailing to and from belligerent ports?”

Upon that subject I do not know that the information in our possession is absolute and final. It has come in two documents by telegram, which, if he pleases, I will read in the terms in which I received them. Of course, they are of the same authority as if they had been received by despatch. I have no reason to doubt them—

“Paris, July 21, 10 a.m.

“The following, dated yesterday, appears in the official part of the Journal Officiel of to-day:—
“With regard to the enemy’s merchant vessels which are now in the ports of the Empire, or which may enter them in ignorance of the state of war, His Majesty has been pleased to order that they should be allowed a period of 30 days to quit those ports. Safe conducts will be given to them to enable them to enter freely the ports to which they belong (ports d’attache) or to sail direct to their port of destination. Vessels which shall have shipped cargoes for French ports and on French account in the ports of the enemy or of neutrals previous to the declaration of war are not subject to capture. They may freely discharge their cargoes in the ports of the Empire, and receive safe conducts to return to the ports to which they belong (ports d’attache).”

That is on the part of France. This is a telegraphic despatch that relates to the other party to the war—

“Ministry of Commerce, Trade, and Public Works.

“Official Telegraphic Despatch.

“The Ministry of Commerce to the Presidents of Königsberg, Stettin, Hanover, and Kiel.

“The Federal Council has decided that in the event of the outbreak of war with France, French merchant vessels which may happen to be in German ports at the commencement of the war, or which may enter such ports before they shall have been informed of the outbreak of war, will be permitted to remain in the ports in which they may find themselves for a period of six weeks, reckoned from the day of the outbreak of war, and to take in or discharge their cargoes as the case may be.”

That is all the information which is in our actual possession; but I do not doubt that the proceedings of these two great, powerful, and highly civilized States with reference to Neutrals and the transactions of commerce will be directed by liberal principles. With respect to the next Question—

“Within what distance of British and Colonial Coasts and Harbours capture or seizure by either of the belligerent Powers will be considered legal?”

I presume that the three-mile limit is that which will be applicable to the decision of these questions; but I believe the right in all cases of decision is with the Prize Court of the capturing Power. My hon. Friend next asks—

“Whether it is intended to define what Merchandize is contraband of war, in order thereby to avoid many of the complications which arose during the American Civil War; and if Coal conveyed to non-blockaded ports will be legal traffic?”

Mr. Gladstone

In answer to the first part of that Question, I have to say that it is not intended on the part of Her Majesty’s Government to define what merchandize is contraband of war. As far as I can answer that would be a task too difficult to undertake by any general definition. There are some articles which from their character are easily pronounced to be contraband of war, but there are others which, though of vital importance in carrying on belligerent operations, can only have their character defined by the circumstances of the case. But it may be as well that I should read to the House a Letter that was written from the Foreign Office by the direction of Lord Malmesbury on the 18th of May 1859. It contains the view which Her Majesty’s Government of that day held, and that view we have seen no reason to change, especially as far as it relates to the subject of coal. The letter is addressed to Messrs. Smith and Gregory, and is as follows—

“Foreign Office, May 18, 1859.

“Gentlemen,—I am directed by the Earl of Malmesbury to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th inst., requesting to be informed whether, under the Proclamation lately issued by Her Majesty, there is any restriction to British ships loading coals and proceeding therewith to French ports, and I am to state to you, in reply, that Her Majesty’s Proclamation does not specify, and could not properly specify, what articles are or are not contraband of war, and that the passages therein referring to contraband are intended not to prohibit the exportation of coal or any other article, but to warn Her Majesty’s subjects that if they do carry, for the use of one belligerent, articles which are contraband of war, and their property be captured by another belligerent, Her Majesty’s Government will not undertake to interfere in their favour against such capture or its consequences. I am to add that the Prize Court of the captor is the competent tribunal to decide whether coal is or is not contraband of war, and that it is obviously impossible for the Government of Her Majesty, as a neutral Sovereign, to anticipate the result of such decision. It appears, however, to Her Majesty’s Government, that, having regard to the present state of naval armaments, coal may in many cases be rightly held to be contraband of war, and, therefore, that all who engage in this traffic must do so at a risk from which Her Majesty’s Government cannot relieve them.

“Messrs. Smith and Gregory.”

I have also been asked whether the Proclamation of Neutrality issued by Her Majesty’s Government is based upon law, or whether it is merely intended to act as a guide to Her Majesty’s subjects. As far as I am aware, the Proclamation is strictly based upon law, and quotes, as my hon. Friend will see, the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act. It is possible, if the foreign enlistment be extended, though I will not say whether it will be necessary, that the provisions of that Act may be embodied in a separate Proclamation.

ARMY—MILITARY SURGEONS AT FRENCH AND PRUSSIAN HEAD QUARTERS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR ANSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he intends to request permission for a British Military Surgeon of experience to be attached to the head quarters of the French and Prussian Armies for the purpose of studying and reporting upon the effects of the more recent inventions of modern warfare, and the most approved methods of transporting sick and wounded Men during rapid movements of Troops? He would also beg to ask whether the statement in the leading article of The Times that morning was correct, that Her Majesty's Government had refused permission to Officers on half or on full pay to proceed to the seat of war; and, if so, what were the reasons that had led to that decision?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the Director General of the Army Medical Department has called my attention to the importance of the measure suggested by my hon. and gallant Friend, and I will endeavour to carry it into effect. In answer to the second Question, I have to say that, in laying down as a general rule that such permission should not be given, I believe Her Majesty's Government have pursued the course adopted on former occasions. I am aware that, in former cases, exceptions have been made; but, in the present instance, Her Majesty's Government have thought it right to adhere to the general rule, and have not felt themselves at liberty to make any exception.

MR. LAYARD AND THE PRINCE OF HOHENZOLLERN.—QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any foundation for a statement which appeared in the "Daily News" of Tuesday last, to the effect that Mr. Layard was aware of the candidature of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, and spoke to M. Mercier on the subject before the action of the French Government in the matter, but did not communicate this important information to the Foreign Office until it had learnt it from other quarters?

MR. OTWAY replied that the first official notification of the candidature of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern that came from Mr. Layard was on the 9th instant; but the candidature had been a matter of notoriety before. He might state that on the 11th of May Mr. Layard, in a despatch, spoke of the probable candidature of a German Prince, and stated what he thought would be its effect upon the relations between France and Spain.

EXPORTATION OF HORSES.

QUESTION.

MAJOR DICKSON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the number of Horses which are being purchased in this Country by Foreign Agents and being shipped to the Continent; and, whether it is intended to put a stop to this export?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have heard, Sir, that there is at present a considerable export of horses going on. That export, I believe, is much more brisk at this than at other seasons of the year. It may possibly be more brisk now than it would usually be at this season; but we do not see any reason, under the circumstances, for any interference.

RICHMOND PARK.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD BULLER said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether there is any sufficient reason for closing the gates of Richmond Park at so early an hour as nine o'clock?

MR. AYRTON replied that the authority to determine when the gates were to be opened or closed was exercised by His Royal Highness the Ranger, and he (Mr. Ayrton) had no right to interfere. If the inhabitants of the neighbourhood felt aggrieved, the best course would be to present a notification of their views and wishes to His Royal Highness, who, no doubt, would give them proper consideration.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—BILLS AFFECTING THE CLERGY.—QUESTION.

MR. HENLEY said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire, Whether he intends to proceed with the Sequestration Bill to-night? He also wished to ask Her Majesty's Government whether, in the present exhausted state of the House and of the Session, they will not consider whether it may not be well to postpone to next Session many of those Bills affecting the Clergy, some of which were printed and some not?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, in reply, that if the Sequestration Bill had been brought down to this House in the state in which it had been originally introduced to the notice of Parliament, it would not have been in his hands; but, as he understood that the objectionable features of the Bill had been removed, he had taken charge of it. Having, at the request of the Solicitor General, hitherto postponed taking the Bill, he would like to put it down for Monday, and then he would state what course he would take.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to ask, with regard to two of the Bills to which the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had referred, the Union of Benefices Bill and the Resignation of Benefices Bill, whether Her Majesty's Government, in deference to an opinion generally entertained in the House, does not think it would be expedient, after communicating with the promoters of the Bills, to state on Monday next that they would consent to postpone them to another Session?

MR. BRUCE: I hope on Monday next to be able to give the answer required.

STRANGERS ORDERED TO WITHDRAW.

MR. HENLEY, addressing Mr. Speaker, said, he saw Strangers present.

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER ordered Strangers to withdraw.

Mr. Ayrton

—[BILL 218.]—CONSIDERATION.

(Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [19th July] proposed to be made on Consideration of the Elementary Education Bill, as amended in the Committee, and which Amendment was,

To insert in the Second Schedule, page 37, line 10, after the words "provided that any poll shall be taken by ballot," the words "in accordance with the principles upon which a poll is taken under 'The Metropolis Management Act, 1855.'" —(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Debate resumed.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE defended himself against any imputation that he wished to impede the progress of the Bill, and said that the proposal of the Government would give the Ballot only in name, and would make it as ridiculous as the hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) said he wished to make it when he proposed the insertion of the word "open." The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had spoken of these words as having been accepted on both sides of the House; but he should like to know who had expressed an opinion favourable to them except the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), and the right hon. Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple), the latter of whom was opposed to the Ballot, while the former seemed to have a facility for suggesting compromises which were considered untenable by hon. Members sitting in that portion of the House, but which were commonly accepted by the Government. The present Amendment, however, was suggested not by the hon. Member for Oldham, but by the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins), who would frankly admit that his intention was to make the Ballot as ridiculous as it was the intention of the hon. Member for West Essex to have made it. The Act was passed at the time when Lord Palmerston was Leader of the House, and at the time when the anti-Ballot party was in a majority in the House; and it was never intended to give the Ballot and to provide for secret voting. The working of the Act in London had certainly not developed anything like what was known as the Ballot; and the very fact that the churchwardens were to nominate the Inspectors under the Act was a very strong reason for regarding the application of it to elections under the Education Bill with suspicion; not that churchwardens would take any unfair advantage of the powers intrusted to them, but in people's minds they would naturally be associated with the Church, and in that way the religious difficulty would be imported into the elections. With regard to the nature of the Ballot which would be established under the alteration which the Government wished to adopt, it was a secret Ballot only in the sense that the Ballot for places in the Ladies' Gallery were secret. Coloured papers were continually used in order to give facility to terrorism. The right hon. Gentleman said it would be his business to improve the working of the old Act. Why, then, put down the words which were on the Paper, for the insertion of which there was no necessity whatever. He believed there had been an agreement arrived at between the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), and that that explained the course which had now been taken. He (Sir Charles Dilke) had never been one of those who asked for the insertion of the Ballot in that Bill; but if the Government had decided to give that security to the country, it was of the greatest importance that the Ballot should not degenerate into a sham. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, in opposing the insertion of any words in regard to the Ballot, used the ordinary argument that it was un-English and sneaking. But he would call their attention to the fact that all the supposed disadvantages of the Ballot would be as certain to occur under the form now proposed, while those advantages which so many hoped for—such as security against intimidation—would have no chance of being secured.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON denied that there was the slightest foundation for the statement made by the hon. Baronet that there was an understanding between the hon. Member for Oldham and himself.

MR. HIBBERT said, that what led to his suggestion was this—that the other night, after 10 or 11 Divisions on the present subject, it struck him that it would be well if some steps were taken to get rid of the opposition of hon. Gentlemen opposite; and it appeared to him that this might easily be done if they confined themselves to principles already embodied in an Act of Parliament—namely, the Metropolis Local Management Act. He had had no consultation whatever with hon. Gentlemen opposite. Shortly after he had made his suggestion the Government expressed their readiness to act on it. The Government, not having decided to omit the Ballot, or adopt what was called a perfect Ballot, had no other course open to them but that which they were now taking. For his part, though a friend to the Ballot, he thought more of the Education Bill than of the Ballot, and if it was necessary to sink the Ballot he would do so rather than sink the Education Bill. It had been said the Ballot of Mr. Hobhouse's Act was not worth having; but, whatever might be done in Chelsea or elsewhere, there could be no doubt that if the conditions of the Act were complied with anybody that liked might secure perfect secrecy, those who might try to contravene it being subject to a penalty of not more than £50, and not less than £10. It was not fair to leave to the Education Department, as the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) wished to do, the determination of the mode by which the Ballot should be taken, for it was quite possible they would then be one day calling the representatives of the Department to account. Far better was it to legislate according to a principle already embodied in an Act of Parliament.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, this was the 21st night of the Education Bill, and he would beg their attention while he explained why the Government had adopted the Ballot question at all in this Bill, and also why he had introduced certain qualifying words. It was not the wish of the Government to raise any other question by the side of such an important one as that of Education; but hon. Members would recollect that during the debate on the second reading many observations were made as to the mode in which elections were likely to be held in the country. He then explained why the Government proposed to introduce the Ballot into this Bill—namely, in order to afford the utmost possible security that the Board which would have to deal with the education of the children should be freely elected by the parents. To insure that being done they struck out the provision relating to plural voting and they introduced the Ballot, and hon. Members ought not to be surprised that the Government had in that way fulfilled their promise. At a later stage his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department alluded to the fact that vote by Ballot was in the Bill, and it was on that understanding that the House went into Committee on the measure. The first re-printed Bill contained clauses providing how the Ballot should be put in operation; but great changes were made subsequently, one of which was the result of an Amendment by the noble Lord the Member for the West Riding (Lord Frederick Cavendish) by which the Committee adopted with unanimity the principle of the cumulative vote. The Government had then to decide whether they would, in a great hurry, draw up a scheme for the working of the Ballot together with the cumulative vote, or whether they would ask to be intrusted with power to provide a plan in their discretion. They drew up clauses which would probably have carried out the views of the Government and have given satisfaction to the House, yet they felt that it would be dangerous to deal with such a difficult matter in so short a time as they had at their disposal. He (Mr. Forster) therefore, gladly accepted an Amendment of the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), who thought that discretion should be given for one year to the Government to make regulations about the Ballot which was to be adopted. There was, however, another remark he might make in reference to the question of the Ballot. When they first proposed to adopt the Ballot in reference to this measure, it seemed certain that during the present Session that question would have been settled by Parliament upon its merits. That was, he knew, an argument against the action which the Government had taken, and although his saying so might seem to give an advantage to his opponents, yet he thought it would be the best policy to state the case fairly. When, however, it became doubtful whether the Ballot question itself would be settled this Session, they considered whether they ought to strike it out of this Bill; but the Government felt they could not do so—firstly, because of the pledge they had given on educational grounds to introduce the Ballot; and, secondly, because the metropolitan Boards would be elected under a system the principle of which was already voting by Ballot. They, however, thought it was their duty to prejudice the question as little as possible, and they, therefore, proposed that their regulations as to a Ballot should last for one year only. These were the reasons why the Government had adopted the Ballot, and they had since introduced the qualifying words in order to meet a suggestion which was made by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) and accepted by several hon. Members opposite, and which seemed to carry out the object which the Government had in view—namely, that the poll should be taken upon the principle of the Metropolis Local Management Act. That principle he understood to be that a Ballot should be taken by means of papers, containing the names of those candidates for whom the electors voted being put into a Ballot-box. His hon. Friend (Sir Charles Dilke) had called that “a sham Ballot;” but he (Mr. Forster) maintained that it was not so. It was established by the 1 & 2 Will. IV., commonly called Hobhouse’s Act; it was made use of at Maryport; and in reference to its adoption there, Mr. Francis Taylor, of Manchester, the chairman of the Liberal Association of that city, had been examined. When he was asked—“Does it secure secrecy?” he replied—“Yes, certainly.” That was the evidence of a gentleman who had paid great attention to the system, which was the foundation of the Ballot as carried out in South Australia. He had himself seen the plan in operation. No one knew the object of his visit, and it was clear to him that, if he pleased, any voter could insure secrecy. The mode in which he saw an election carried on was this—On a table in the room where the voting occurred there was an official list containing the names of the candidates. Several gentlemen and some ladies, who voted in his presence, entered the room, and, without anybody being able to see what they did, they struck off the papers which they received the names of those for whom they did not wish to vote; those papers were then folded up and put into a Ballot-box, and he defied anybody to find out how those persons voted. Some others came in with coloured papers which showed how they were going to vote; but it was evident that no one cared whether the voting should be secret or open, for there was no excitement; but that was no fault of the plan, while nothing could be easier than to make a regulation to the effect that none but the official voting papers should be used. He had, on behalf of the Education Department, to solve the very difficult question as to what kind of Ballot ought ultimately to be adopted in reference to the election of Boards. There appeared to be two kinds of Ballot—in one the voter might have secrecy if he pleased; but in the other secret voting was compulsory, and it was because he understood his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) and those who thought like him, to mean that secrecy in the election of Boards ought to be of the compulsory kind, that he felt it would not be desirable for the Government to be hampered with that condition. He, however, maintained that the plan on which the election of vestrymen in the metropolis was conducted was one by which the voter might secure secrecy if he pleased, and therefore the hon. Member for Oldham was right in saying that there was no sham or deception about that system. He submitted that the Government had not gratuitously imported the question of the Ballot into this Bill, while it was due to his own personal character to say that in proposing a particular form of Ballot he did not intend to be any party to a deception. The Government made this proposition for only one year. In conclusion, he appealed to hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, and to his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) whether, after the explanation he had given them, they would not allow the Bill to proceed.

MR. COLLINS said, the suggestion did not originally come from the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert). He (Mr. Collins) objected on all occasions to increasing the power of the Executive, his maxim being rather to cripple it. He did not like a set of clerks prescribing to the country the mode in which they were to be governed. There was no constitutional objection at first, when clauses were proposed to be inserted embodying the mode of Ballot to be adopted, nor was there any objection on that ground when the hon. Member for Oldham suggested a mode authorized by an Act of Parliament. He regarded it as unfortunate that the Ballot had been introduced into this Bill, for he did not doubt that had the House passed the Parliamentary Elections Bill, the adoption of the Ballot in reference to the election of education Boards would have been a natural consequence.

MR. LEATHAM said, he had no hesitation as to the course he should pursue after the explanation of his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council. The settlement now proposed would in no way interfere with what should be done next year when they came to deal with Parliamentary and municipal elections. All that was now proposed was such a mode of election as should be accurate and efficient to meet the necessity of the case. He should vote with the Government.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he was not satisfied that the ratepayers in the rural districts would have what was promised to them by the right hon. Gentleman—sufficient protection. It was said this was a temporary measure, and would not in any way govern the future application of the Ballot to Parliamentary and municipal elections. But they should now either have a real and honest Ballot or none at all; and he would be content to see the Ballot struck out of the Bill altogether rather than have the proposal now submitted to them carried into law. It would give no protection whatever. In rural districts it would leave matters very much in the hands of the churchwardens. There was nothing to prevent them from determining that the votes for the clergyman's candidates should be on red paper and the Dissenting minister's candidates on blue paper. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: That will be prevented by our regulations.] He would then ask why the regulations were not put in their Amendment. He did not wonder that the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) was in favour of the Amendment. In fact, out-of-doors it was called "Collins's Patent Open Voting Ballot." He should be no party to such an arrangement. They would either have a Ballot that would give security or no Ballot at all.

MR. FLOYER said, that some Gentlemen seemed to think that the rural districts were the proper ground for experimentalizing with respect to the Ballot. For himself, he could not see why these districts should be selected more than the town districts. Such a proposal was based upon the old squire and parson argument, which had long ago been exploded. He himself believed that an unfounded prejudice existed against the parsons and squires, and the idea of trying the Ballot in the rural districts as an experiment was based upon that prejudice. He protested against such a procedure.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY observed that the position in which they found themselves was not a very agreeable one, owing to the course which had been pursued by the Government. If it was the case, as had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, that the metropolis was the only place in which there would be an election within a limited period, it might have been sufficient to provide that it should be held under the conditions of the present law. But they were now in a different position. The right hon. Gentleman did not ask them to adopt the Act in force in the metropolis, but something which he believed to be in accordance with the principles of that Act. The right hon. Gentleman not only asked them to grant larger powers than he thought ought to be accorded to any Education Department, but wanted to select what constituencies he pleased and to impose upon them what rules he pleased. He found himself, therefore, compelled, though entirely disagreeing from the opinions of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles Dilke), to support his Motion in preference to that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 185 ; Noes 115 : Majority 70.

MR. CAWLEY, with a view to preventing a secret candidate being foisted upon any district and carried without the knowledge of the ratepayers, moved an Amendment, requiring that public notice should be given of the nomination of a candidate seven days before taking the poll.

Amendment proposed,

In the Second Schedule, page 37, at end of first paragraph, to add the words "but no person shall be elected unless he shall have been proposed for election in the manner prescribed by such regulations, and public notice of his nomination shall have been published by the officer appointed to conduct such election, not less than seven clear days before the day appointed for taking the poll."—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment, remembering that this power was given to the Education Board only for one year. He would bear the suggestion in mind, in order to prevent any election being made without proper publicity.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD JOHN MANNERS moved, Fifth Schedule, after "Marylebone," insert "Paddington, Saint Pancras." The noble Lord observed that, by adopting the Parliamentary divisions of the metropolis, they would be placing the election of school Boards in the hands of those who managed the Parliamentary elections. The borough of Marylebone occupied 5,000 or 6,000 acres, and contained a population of 500,000 ; and the object of his Amendment was to divide that immense constituency into the three well-recognized and long-established divisions of St. Marylebone Proper, Paddington, and St. Pancras, for the purpose of facilitating the election of a school Board.

Amendment proposed, in the Fifth Schedule, page 42, after the word "Marylebone," to insert the words "Paddington, Saint Pancras."—(Lord John Manners.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER reminded the noble Lord that the principle adopted by the House was not school Boards for each division, but a school Board for the whole metropolis ; and it would be impossible to carry that principle into effect if the divisions suggested in the Amendment were to be made. The objection with regard to the danger of these elections following in the same groove as Parliamentary elections would be removed by the operation of the cumulative vote.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

IRISH LAND BILL.

LORDS' AMENDMENTS CONSIDERED.

Lords Amendments to Commons Amendments to Lords Amendments, and Lords Reasons for disagreement to certain Amendments, considered.

New clause (A), (Permissive Registration of Improvements).

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Government regretted that the Lords had thought it necessary to insist upon the retention of this clause, and the Government had not changed their opinion as to its disadvantages; but, rather than risk the safety of the Bill, they did not propose to insist upon the Amendments made by the House of Commons.

MR. SYNAN said, the adoption of the Amendment was substantially a repeal of the 5th and also of the 4th clause. The Bill had been framed on the principle that the tenant was not a free agent and could not consent, and yet it was now proposed, if a landlord, with the consent of the tenant, registered any improvements as made by himself, the tenant should be deprived of all title to compensation. The landlord would be enabled to register improvements as his own which the tenant had really made, and the tenant must either allow the landlord to register them, or he must give up the farm, if the landlord was so bad as to insist upon it. If there were no bad or felonious landlords in Ireland the Bill was unnecessary; and if the Bill was necessary, this Amendment would defeat its object, and sanction the bad system it was intended to put an end to.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government agreed in many of the objections raised by the hon. Member; but it was not necessary for him to enter into arguments which had been fully discussed on many previous occasions. The Government adhered to the opinions which they had already expressed; but he wished to point out an overstatement of the case from the hon. Member's own point of view, and a material omission in his speech. He thought the hon. Member overstated the case when he gave the House to understand that under the operation of this Bill, if passed in its present form, such would be the condition of the Irish occupier that, however extraordinary or monstrous might be the claim made by the landlord, he would not venture to resist. Without going into the question as to how far landlords would be likely to claim to register as their own the tenants' improvements, he would remark that the Government believed that the restraints imposed on evictions by this Bill would give the tenant a position such as he had not before known, and one which would enable him to enforce his rights. The omission of the hon. Member had reference to an essential point in the argument. The question for him was not whether this was a good or a bad clause, but whether he would be content, upon the rejection of this clause by the House of Commons, to see the Bill lost in the Lords. They had now reached a point at which it would be unseemly and absurd to bandy the Bill backwards and forwards between the two Houses. Such a procedure would not be to the advantage of either, and nobody would derive an advantage from a prolongation of the controversy. The Government wished, therefore, to send the Bill back to the House of Lords, after the operations of that night, in a form to which they meant to adhere, leaving it to others, if they chose, to raise further difficulties to the passing of the measure. With that intention they could not properly—or, he would even say, honourably—insist upon anything which they did not consider to be of vital importance. Was the hon. Member prepared to say that rather than pass the Bill without this clause he would see the Bill lost? If he was, then he was consistent in the course he was pursuing; but if he was not, then he was raising an irrelevant issue. As stated by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the Government were unwilling to risk the passage of the Bill, and they therefore waived their objections to the clause.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, his opinion had always been in favour of the clause, and reminded the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Synan) that the larger tenants were now excepted from the presumption of Clause 5, and it was chiefly with regard to the larger farms that the preservation of evidence would be important. He hoped the hon. Gentleman on reflection would not think it was really probable that Irish landlords would claim a right to improvements which they had never made.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he regretted that the Government had acceded to a clause which, in his opinion, would lead to much litigation. He thought also that they might have found a cheaper tribunal for registration purposes than the Landed Estates Court; the clerk of the Union might have performed this duty.

Resolved, That this House doth not insist upon the Amendments to which The Lords disagree; and doth agree to the Amendments made by The Lords to the Amendments made by this House; and doth not insist upon its disagreement with The Lords in the Amendments as far as the Amendment in page 8, line 16.

The Clerk at the Table then read the following:—

"The Lords insist on their Amendments in page 8, line 8 and line 16, to which the Commons have disagreed, for the following reasons:—Because it would be unjust to treat a landlord as disturbing a tenant in his holding who does no more than proceed to evict the tenant because the tenant makes default in the fulfilment of his part of the contract of tenancy—namely, payment of the stipulated rent; and because the clause, as altered by the Commons, would leave it virtually open to every judge, without any principle or rules being laid down to guide him, to determine arbitrarily what shall or shall not be a disturbance by the landlord."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that this was the only point in the present stage of the Bill upon which the Government felt it to be impossible to agree with the Lords. The Government had already made considerable sacrifice for the sake of agreement at this final stage; but on this important clause they could not entirely concur with the Lords; on the contrary, they were obliged to differ from them to some considerable extent, though not altogether. The state in which this clause, now numbered 9, but best known as Clause 8, came before the Commons was this—The well-known words which enabled the Court to deal with certain cases of ejection for non-payment of rent as a cause of disturbance upon "special grounds" had been struck out—that was, the words "on special grounds" had been omitted by the Lords, for the reason that they would confer on the Judge a dangerously extensive and vague power, and would enable him to determine arbitrarily what should or should not be deemed disturbance by a landlord. After careful consideration, the Government had made up their minds to give up the words "on special grounds;" but, on the other hand, they could not concur in confining the clause to the single special case which had been substituted by the Lords for the wider discretion originally vested in the Judge; the special case being that of a tenant over whose head old arrears for rent were hanging. That case, no doubt, was an important one; but the Government were strongly of opinion that, considering the admittedly unprotected condition of the smaller tenants, and the numbers of them who had been obliged to submit to the rents they now pay, it would be unjust and impolitic to leave them without some protection from the clause. For that purpose the Government proposed—without striking out any of the words now in the clause—to insert, in line 34, these words—

"Of a holding valued at a sum not exceeding £15 per annum, if the Court shall be of the opinion that the non-payment of the rent is owing to its being excessive."

By the adoption of this Amendment the operation of the clause would certainly be reduced to something narrower and more definite than was originally proposed; but it would at least provide for the protection of that class of tenants who most needed it, and he earnestly hoped that the clause, as thus amended, would meet with the acceptance of both of the Houses of Parliament. He moved that the House should agree to the Lords' Amendments, and should insert the words above mentioned.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, that the case provided for by the Lords' Amendment of a tenant who owed three years' rent was a purely imaginary one. Such a provision might have been of some use in the years immediately following the famine; but everyone who knew anything of the present condition of Ireland was aware that you might go through the length and breadth of the land before finding a tenant who was three years in arrears with his rent.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, it was not proposed to strike out anything which the Lords had put in, but to add the words alluded to.

Sir Roundell Palmer

MR. SYNAN said, that by the course now proposed to be pursued it was evident that all persons whose holdings were above the annual value of £15 were, at a stroke, deprived of the benefit of the clause. To that extent the Bill was rendered illusive. He also entirely agreed with his hon Friend (Mr. Downing) that tenants owing three years' rent might be searched for almost in vain all over Ireland. But, after what had been said by the Prime Minister, it seemed that the House must either accept the Lords' Amendments, or sacrifice the Bill; so that all he could do was to utter his ineffectual protest.

DR. BALL said, this clause, and especially the section of it now under discussion, had been strongly opposed when they were in Committee on the Bill, though no Division was taken, the fact being that the House was so thin, and so many of the Members of the Opposition were away, that it appeared to him to be useless to challenge a Division. The present concession of the Government was undoubtedly valuable, and took away the unlimited powers formerly given to the Judge; but the section still contained an objectionable element, because it allowed the chairman to be the judge of the rent—to say in the case of all holdings under £15 that the rent was too high, and that to attempt to enforce it would be equivalent to disturbance. The fact would not be confined to the particular cases adjudicated upon. For instance, if a tenant was considered by the Judge to be paying too high a rent for a particular piece of ground, it was clear that all the other tenants in the same district and of about the same sized holdings would take advantage of the decision, and that thus a readjustment of rents would virtually be the result. He should have greatly preferred the Bill if all reference to ejectment for rent had been omitted; but, at the same time, it would be matter for consideration whether, with the view to the success of the measure, the concession of the Government ought not to be accepted.

MR. GLADSTONE confessed that he was disappointed in all but the last sentence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He denied that when the clause was originally under discussion that the House was a thin one, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not entitled now to plead the absence of his friends as a reason why no Division was taken. Besides, other opportunities for raising the question had not been taken advantage of by hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite. The truth was, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was obliged to search far and wide in order to justify—not his own conduct, which needed no justification—but the conduct of noble Lords in “another place.” The right hon. and learned Gentleman also misapprehended the nature of the clause. It would have no effect in determining rents. Whatever rent any peasant in open market was ready to offer, after eviction had taken place, might be received by the landlord, and no person could interfere, either directly or indirectly, with the contract. The whole operation of the clause was retrospective, and it was not even retrospective with regard to rent; but it only provided that where, in the opinion of the chairman, rent had been extortionate, he should be entitled to make an allowance to the tenant. The Government admitted that they attached great value to this clause. They had themselves done all in their power, and they had exerted their utmost influence with their followers, to avoid conflict, and to wash their hands of the responsibility of a confirmed difference of opinion between the two Houses. In order to bring about agreement, they had now given up a large portion of the clause, though it had originally passed through the Committee without a Division or serious opposition. He trusted, therefore, that they might accept the last sentence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite as the key to the intentions of the Opposition; for it would be painful to contemplate the breaking down of such a Bill as this, and there were other consequences of such a breaking down to which it was not now necessary to refer. They made with the greatest pain and reluctance this concession, because it was against their conviction of what the Bill ought to accomplish, and they only did it under a sense of the extreme responsibility that would rest on those who left anything undone that might avert a rupture between the two Houses. Government had not desired, and did not desire to go into any general discussion as to the course that had been taken in reference to this Bill in “another place,” and they hoped they would not be driven into such a discussion, for he was sure that if they were the results would be painful and injurious. He hoped that the concession they now made would be met in a corresponding spirit, if not, they would feel that after all the pledges they had given, and the exhortations they had addressed to the Members on their own side of the House, the very ground upon which those appeals were based had been cut away under their feet.

Mrs. GEORGE JENKINSON said, that the right hon. Gentleman had said that the Amendment of the Government would not give the chairman power to lower the rent of a tenant; but as the right hon. Gentleman had admitted, in the next sentence, that it would enable him to grant a compensatory allowance to the tenant in instances where he considered the rent to be extortionate, it was difficult to understand the point of the right hon. Gentleman's denial. He strongly objected to the Amendment of the Government.

Mr. DISRAELI said, he thought it expedient, after all that had occurred, that the suggestion of the Government should be favourably considered. He must, however, correct the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown in the representation he had made as to the conduct of his right hon. and learned Friend near him (Dr. Ball) when he said that he had taken objection to this principle at the ninth hour. The fact was that his right hon. and learned Friend had continually, during the discussion, objected to this principle, and, although he did not consider it expedient to test the favour in which his views were held by the House—he would not go into the details to which the right hon. Gentleman referred—his right hon. and learned Friend did take frequent opportunities to reiterate his objection. He, therefore, could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that this objection was now taken at the last moment. He thought if anything had distinguished the conduct of his right hon. and learned Friend in reference to this Bill, it was not so much the learning, eloquence, and readiness with which he addressed himself to every question—quite superior to all petty party considerations—but the fair and candid spirit he had exemplified throughout the conduct of the measure. He could not refrain, in justice to his right hon. and learned Friend, from making these observations against the attack of the right hon. Gentleman, which he thought was not well-founded. So far as this proposition of the Government was concerned, he should not oppose it or ask the opinion of the House upon it. He would leave those to deal with it who had recently considered it, and he had no doubt they would deal with it in the spirit of wisdom and patriotism.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, he was willing as any other Member to bear his testimony to the ability and good feeling displayed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball), who, he was proud to say, had eminently upheld the fame of the Irish Bar in that House; but the question before them was not one of a compliment to that or the other Law Officer or ex-Law Officer; it was one of serious moment to the tenantry of Ireland; and in that sense he alone would regard it. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury rightly appreciated the difficult position of those Irish Members who had given a consistent support to the present Bill in all its stages, and who, while endeavouring to render it more useful, never failed to admit the value and importance of its main provisions. It was hard enough for them to render their constituents contented with the measure, even as it left that House for "another place;" and therefore every attempt at curtailing its protective provisions, or in any way diminishing its value, enhanced the difficulty of their task. Admitting, as he must do, the critical position of the Bill at the present moment, and the absolute necessity of removing any serious impediment to its success, he could not but deplore the course the Government felt themselves compelled to take with respect to the Amendment now before them. In his opinion, the line was drawn too low down, and might have been placed at a much higher without alarming the susceptibilities of those who were ever in alarm about the so-called rights of property. There seemed no reason why it should not be raised much higher than £15 valuation. However, as the Government stated their determination to take that course, and adopt that figure, he knew it was impossible because useless to resist; and therefore he and his hon. Friends around him had no option but reluctantly to submit. But, now that the Bill was leaving the House, probably for the last time, he would say that he was anxious to render it as acceptable as possible to all classes of the Irish community—that it might be felt as a gift from Parliament to the people of Ireland—a gift from the English people to the people of the sister country. The Bill did not, it is true, realize all the hopes entertained of it; but no reasonable man could doubt that it contained in it enough to do great good, in developing by protecting the energy of the tenant, and promoting a mutual good feeling between the one class and the other. He regretted the decision of the Government in the present instance; but he felt, under the special circumstances in which the Bill was placed, there was no choice left to those who were responsible for its carriage, though in their anxiety to deprecate opposition he thought they had gone too far.

Amendment in page 8, line 16, upon which their Lordships insist, agreed to, with an Amendment.

Lords Amendment to Commons Amendment to Clause (D) disagreed to.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE proposed an Amendment on the Lords' Amendment relative to the form in which the chairman's award should be given. The Lords had inserted a clause which required the chairman, in every case, to state in detail "the particulars and character" of the compensation awarded. This, it was thought, would tend to multiply appeals, and he now proposed to insert "the nature or particulars," &c.

DR. BALL said, the award ought to state the character of the loss for which compensation was to be given, whether it was for improvements or loss of occupation.

MR. GLADSTONE suggested that the word "character" should be retained as sufficient.

Committee appointed, "to draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendment made by The Lords to the Amendment made by this House to Clause (D), to which this House hath disagreed:"—MR. GLADSTONE, MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, MR. SECRETARY BRUCE, MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND, MR. ARTON, THE JUDGE ADVOCATE, MR. GLYN, and MR. ADAM:—To withdraw immediately; Three to be the quorum.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,784, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the Registrars of Friendly Societies in England, Scotland, and Ireland."

MR. RYLANDS said, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in a Bill on this subject he stated that the duties of registrar were of an insignificant character, and might be performed by a clerk of the Board of Trade, which would save the country £1,000 a year, which was paid to the late Mr. Tidd Pratt. He found, however, that £800 a year was given to the present registrar, who was also in receipt of £1,200 a year as assistant solicitor to the Treasury, so that that gentleman was either receiving his salary as solicitor without having a corresponding amount of work, or he was receiving this £800 a year without justification. He moved that the salary of the registrar be omitted from the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £800, for the Registrar of Friendly Societies, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK trusted that the matter would be allowed to stand over for this Session, at all events, as the members of the friendly societies attached great value to the existence of the office.

MR. WHITWELL believed that what duties there were could be as well performed by a clerk of the Board of Trade as by an official with £800 a year, and supported the reduction all the more readily as the continued sanction of the present arrangement might ultimately involve a claim for compensation if the office were abolished.

MR. HERMON believed that the salary was not paid for any useful purpose.

MR. STANSFELD explained that the appointment was only temporary, and could in no case give rise to any claim for compensation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed to deal with this appointment, and modify the character of the work, but had not yet been able to carry out his intention, and a Commission was about to be appointed to inquire into the operation of these societies. That Commission would be immediately appointed; but until it had reported, and the Government had considered its recommendations, it would be necessary that some person should hold the office. The most reasonable way of managing the matter was to appoint some one to the office temporarily. The effect of the Amendment, if successful, would be that the business of the Department under the Act of Parliament could not be done.

MR. ACLAND said, he wished it to be clearly understood that the work done in the registrar's office was by no means of a perfunctory or formal character. The most vigilant watchfulness was exercised in the office over the various benefit societies which came under it. What was to be regretted was that the signature of Mr. Tidd Pratt to the legality of friendly societies was taken to mean a great deal more than it really did.

MR. HERMON said, that if the assistant registrar had time to earn £800 in another department, he must be overpaid in the law department.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE said, that the services of the late Mr. Tidd Pratt as registrar were most valuable, and the necessity for obtaining his signature to the rules of a benefit society had often prevented the establishing of rules which would have operated most prejudicially upon the members of such societies.

MR. RYLANDS said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself had stated that the office held by Mr. Tidd Pratt could be done away with without detriment to the public service, and its duties distributed among other Departments, so that the salary of £1,000 a year could be altogether saved.

MR. CANDLISH said, that the duties of the office could have been delegated to the assistant registrar, who had a salary of £500 a year, and who, as a matter of practice, did the main part of the work, if he was not clothed with the main responsibility.

MR. STANSFELD said, the assistant registrar was appointed in consequence of the great accumulation of the work.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Stansfeld

(2.) £241,656, Stationery, Printing, &c.

MR. MACFIE suggested that The London Gazette, instead of being sold at a high figure, should be reduced in price. He believed that would be true economy; for though a profit was realized upon it now, its sale was very limited, and if the price were lowered the sale would greatly increase. He also suggested that greater facilities should be given to the public for the purchase of Parliamentary Papers, which at present were only sold to the extent of £542.

In reply to MR. WHITWELL,

MR. STANSFELD said, the Army and Navy Lists were not sold at a profit.

In reply to MR. HERMON,

MR. STANSFELD said, there was a reduction of nearly £30,000 on the Stationery Vote, but it was obtained by legitimate economy, and not by means of keeping a smaller stock of stationery on hand.

MR. RYLANDS said, that the sale of waste paper in the Stationery Department and in Hansard's office had realized £10,000. It would be very beneficial if a portion of the Parliamentary Papers, which were of general public interest, should be sent to public libraries and museums.

In reply to MR. CANDLISH,

MR. STANSFELD said, that the sum of £23,000 received for advertisements in The London Gazette was obtained partly from private advertisements, and partly from public advertisements inserted by the various Departments of the Executive. The item, therefore, was not all profit.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £17,524, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and of the Office of Land Revenue Records and Inrolments."

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, it was very difficult to describe the position held by Mr. Gore and Mr. Howard. From the remarks made respecting this office the other day, they seemed to be almost above the law and beyond the purview of this House. Still, he did not consider that they were quite heaven-born administrators; and it was instructive to note that in the Report of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests and Land Revenues for the year 1868-9, which was the last year they could refer to, the Woods and Forests, once the principal sources of Revenue of this Department, yielded from some 120,000 acres a gross revenue of £49,532, the expenditure being £48,763, leaving a net balance of £769. But if a fair proportion of the Vote of £26,958 for Salaries, Law Charges, and Expenses of the Department be charged to the Woods and Forests, the expenditure will be found to exceed the income by many thousand pounds. It was true that the expenditure on Windsor Forest was £20,000, while that on the other forests was £28,700. Everyone knew that the New Forest contained something like 63,000 acres. The receipts from that forest last year amounted to £15,534, and the expenditure to £13,766, leaving a profit of only £1,768, a sum on which the Commissioners could scarcely pride themselves. He thought that by a judicious appropriation of some parts of that forest, it might be made much more remunerative without depriving the people of the enjoyment which it afforded them. He was convinced that nothing would be done by the Commissioners unless pressure was brought to bear on them from outside. It was said they were bound by their oaths to obtain as much money as possible for the State, and that was, he supposed, the reason why they dug gravel pits in Blackheath; and it would, perhaps, be gratifying to the inhabitants of Blackheath to know that a sum of £53 had been spent on levelling those gravel pits, which was exactly one year's income from their working. With regard to the Thames Embankment, which was one of the most beautiful as it was one of the greatest works of the century, he could not but point out the want of taste displayed by the Commissioners in erecting a dead wall on the land side of the Embankment, instead of having a beautiful railing, such as that which surrounded Hyde Park. He supposed we might consider ourselves fortunate if the Commissioners, in obedience to their agreement and oaths, did not let out this wall for advertising purposes, by which means possibly £700 a year might be realized, if a proper appeal were made to sensational advertisers.

The Commissioners of Woods and Forests had obstructed the improvements at Hamilton Place and Park Lane. He could not avoid referring to the very heavy item for the Queen's Road (better known as Palace Gardens), Kensington, it being no less than £1,185, from which £307 received from the inhabitants was to be deducted. Yet cabs were not permitted to be driven on this road, which certainly required alteration. A sum of £7,860 was charged for legal expenses, and this, in his opinion, was very high. The expenditure last year of receivers, for their salaries and incidental expenses, was £14,500, which, added to the sum of £27,227 for offices and including law expenses, amounted to £41,727. He was not prepared to move the reduction of the Vote; but he should like to have some explanation of the figures he had brought before hon. Members.

Mr. MELLOR said, that his analysis of those accounts brought him to very much the same results as those previously indicated by the worthy Alderman. The receipts from all sources upon those various estates were £446,173, while the total expenditure upon the Department was no less than £101,717, or over 22 per cent. This was a matter which really required the attention of gentlemen at the head of these Departments, and he hoped that some attention would be paid to it during the Recess, else he would find himself compelled next Session to move the omission of the Vote altogether.

Mr. GOLDNEY said, that the evidence taken before a recent Committee showed that all the establishment charges for the Woods and Forest Department were voted in the Estimates, whilst all other expenses were, to a certain extent, in the discretion of the heads of the Department, subject, however, more or less, to the approval of the Treasury. Unfortunately the Treasury understood their duty to be to get as much money as they could from the estates, without considering the means of enjoyment or the privileges of the public. He concurred in thinking that the whole subject ought to be reconsidered next year, for there undoubtedly existed a growing feeling of dissatisfaction with the mode in which these large estates, and especially the New Forest, were managed. In a few days it would be his duty, at the request of the people living in the neighbourhood of the New Forest, to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Commissioners would not abstain from incurring further expense in planting that estate with timber. He was one of those who did not believe in the growth of timber. If land would produce a rental of 10s. an acre, then it did not pay to grow timber on it; and there was no justification for growing timber in the New Forest, except when the ships of the Navy used to be built of oak, and it was thought expedient to have a supply of seasoned timber obtained in that way, because in times of emergency they might not be able to get it from private traders. That state of things had, however, now passed away, and those large estates might be made much more productive in a pecuniary point of view, and also much more conducive to the pleasure and recreation of the community.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, they had an opportunity the other evening of hearing what were the Prerogatives of the Crown in that matter, and the nature of the contract between the Crown and its subjects when any new Sovereign succeeded to the Throne. It was well known that estates that originally belonged to the Crown, and were formerly managed by Royal functionaries, at the commencement of every reign became national property, the Crown being voted a certain income, and the public taking those estates into their own management. For that purpose the Commissioners of Woods and Forests had been appointed, and the question which any ordinary man of business would ask was, whether those estates were now managed profitably and for the advantage of the nation? The answer unfortunately must be that they were notoriously and infamously mismanaged, and of this fact the New Forest was one illustration. He did not know who the Commissioners now charged with the duty of looking after those estates for the benefit of the nation were, and therefore it must not be supposed he was making a personal attack on them, but he must say he believed that property had not been managed either carefully or creditably. Not only in many instances was little or no revenue derived from this valuable property, but when the account was taken the balance was on the wrong side, and losses had resulted consequently. It was now proposed to act as spendthrifts and dispose of the estates, whereas by good management a larger income might be received from them. As to the New Forest, he did not agree that all the timber should be cut down, and the place parcelled out in farms. There was a Bill now before the House in reference to Epping Forest, over which the Crown possessed extensive rights; but unless the public looked uncommonly sharp those rights would be sacrificed for the sake of convenience and to save trouble. He would not propose any reduction of the Vote; but he earnestly suggested that steps should be taken by the Government to make the Crown Lands as profitable as possible.

MR. STANSFELD said, he was aware that the Office of Woods and Forests was not a popular Department, because the interests which it was their duty to defend did not always commend themselves to popular approval. He, however, should not be doing his duty if he did not make some reply to the remarks of the hon. Member for London (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence), who had introduced this subject, and whom he should hold responsible for the speech which had succeeded his own. [A laugh.] Nothing could please his hon. Friend. When the Commissioners sought to manage the Crown estates profitably, he said they were disregarding the interests and rights of the public. With regard to allowing cabs to go through Palace Gardens, to do so would be a breach of the covenants of the leases on which the houses were built. He must know that before that road was executed the land was Crown property let upon certain leases, one of the conditions of which was that the road was to be kept a private one under an Act of Parliament. Then, the hon. Member for the City had talked about the Thames Embankment; but he had no intention of following his example and reopening that subject further than to say that the Commissioners of Woods had felt bound, in the discharge of their duty, to take care that the rights of the Crown should be secured. The hon. Member, referring to the administration of the Royal Forests, had dealt with Windsor Forest as though it were one of the Royal Forests, which was not the case, it being merely a sort of appendage to the Castle, and being appropriated for the recreation of the public. The hon. Member had said that that forest only produced a balance of £700 per annum profit; but he must bear in mind that the property was not maintained with a view to profit. The total receipts for the Royal Forests, properly so-called, for the year 1868-9, amounted to £42,606 15s., against an expenditure of £28,752 18s. 8d.; but that expenditure included large sums expended on capital account for making new plantations. When the subject of the New Forest was under discussion in that House some months ago he had stated that he could not consent to deal with that forest on an account which merely showed the receipts and the expenditure, unless the sums expended or accruing on capital account were plainly shown. Mr. Clutton, the well-known eminent surveyor to the Office of Works, had just made his Report to the Treasury on that footing, and that Report would receive the most careful consideration of the Treasury, who would be prepared to advise the House of Commons upon the subject next year, and to suggest the course that should be pursued with respect to that property. The administration by the Office of Woods of the ordinary property of the Crown, consisting of houses, farms, &c., would compare favourably with that of the best managed private estates, the gross expenditure being 10 per cent on the total receipts, but 4 per cent was due to the property tax allowed to Crown tenants, and the various other fixed charges over which the Commissioners of Woods had virtually no control, and 2 per cent was expended for repairs and other necessary expenses, leaving only 4 per cent for the costs of actual management. In reference to the last somewhat remarkable speech to which they had listened, he must say that the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Mr. M. Chambers), when he charged the Commissioners of Woods with having infamously mismanaged the Crown property, should have been prepared to substantiate that charge by facts and figures, and not have contented himself with mere vague generalities. As far as his personal knowledge of the Commissioners went, he must say that they were actuated by a most rigid sense of duty with reference to the trust imposed upon them. He might further say that both the surveyor and the solicitor to the Commissioners were gentlemen whose eminence in their professions was a guarantee that the confidence of the Commissioners and of the Government in them was not misplaced. It would be as well for hon. Members to remember that in all matters where a directionary power was to be exercised it was the Treasury and not the Commissioners who were responsible for the course to be adopted.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH remarked that his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) had done no more than justice to the position and the conduct of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The right hon. Gentleman was also correct in stating that the Treasury were responsible in all cases where the most rigorous exercise of the rights of the Crown were departed from. He protested against the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Mr. M. Chambers), which contained statements which could not be established. The net revenue of the Crown estates had increased, and was likely to increase from year to year. The 14,000 or 15,000 acres of which Windsor Park consisted were a vast pleasure ground, which was available for the people as well as for the Sovereign. With respect to the New Forest, he trusted his right hon. Friend would consider well before he determined upon the policy of breaking up that ancient and remarkable district, though it might be many years before the young plantations were likely to supply a pecuniary return. In his opinion, no gentlemen were more unjustly accused in that House of niggardliness than those who in these matters had the management of the rights of the Crown.

MR. C. S. READ desired to know what was the remuneration paid to the surveyor?

MR. GOLDNEY said, he concurred with the Secretary to the Treasury that no estates had been better managed simply with a view to pecuniary return; but it was a question, nevertheless, whether a larger portion of the property of the Crown might not be devoted to public purposes.

MR. MUNTZ said, he did not see why hon. Gentlemen who criticized these Estimates should be charged with attacking the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. He had watched the course of this Department for a long time, and the language used in its defence had always been—"We hope that, next Session, something will be done." He, however, would take the liberty to propose something this year. He found that the receiver general was paid £600 a year; the assistant receiver, £400; the solicitor, £1,800; a clerk, £550; and two other clerks, £250 and £210 a year respectively. Without objecting to any of the salaries, he would move that the Vote be reduced by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member (Mr. Muntz) would himself be amazed and abashed if he succeeded in carrying his Motion, as the effect of it would be to take away the salaries of certain gentlemen. He objected to the hon. Member drawing his bow at a venture and moving the reduction of the Vote, without pointing out in detail the mode by which the reduction was to be effected. The hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Mr. M. Chambers) had made some heavy charges. When charges were made against members of the permanent Civil Service they ought either to be met, or inquiries ought to be made. He believed that the two gentlemen who were at the Woods and Forests might vie with any other gentlemen in the Civil Service as regarded the manner in which their duties were discharged. He hoped that his hon. and learned Friend would recede from the broad proposition he had laid down, for which he had not quoted authority. Such charges ought not to be made without good ground, or unless it was designed that an investigation should take place. The Treasury were as responsible for the acts of the Woods and Forests as for any other Department of the Government. There had been a steady increase, amounting, he believed, to £5,000 a year in the rental of the Department of Woods and Forests during a period nearly approaching 20 years. They had now reached the time when, under the management of these gentlemen, the revenue paid into the Exchequer—which was £385,000 this year—equalled exactly the charge which had been made upon the Civil List. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would mitigate his condemnation of the Department.

Mr. DISRAELI said, he thought that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) was scarcely open to the charge made against him by the right hon. Gentleman of being deficient in detail. On the contrary, he appeared to be eminently remarkable for detail, for he went through the salaries of the officers mentioned in the Vote, and approved of them all. Then he arrived at the logical conclusion that it was necessary to reduce the Vote. In fact, the hon. Member had the same command of detail that characterized his distinguished predecessor, Mr. Joseph Hume, in the old days; only he did not reach conclusions so satisfactory. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would not press his Motion to a Division. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had adverted to some painful circumstances which rendered it necessary for him to effect a change in the administration of the Woods and Forests. When he (Mr. Disraeli) was Chancellor of the Exchequer the whole of the management of the Woods and Forests was, in consequence of that change, brought under his consideration, and he had to go minutely into the subject. The gentlemen who at present held the office of Commissioners were in no way connected with him in political life, and he concluded that laborious investigation with the impression that there was no private property in this country better managed than were the Crown estates. He quite agreed with the Prime Minister in thinking that there were no public servants who were more deserving of the confidence of the country than the gentlemen to whom he alluded.

Mr. MUNTZ said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had evidently misunderstood him; for while he approved of the first class, he disapproved of items in the second class, to the amount of £1,000. However, as both sides of the House were opposed to a Division he would withdraw his Motion.

Mr. M. CHAMBERS said, he had purposely abstained from details for fear the main issue should be lost sight of; and declaring that he knew none of the Commissioners, he disowned any intention of making a personal attack, but charged all the mismanagement home to the Government as trustees of the pro-party. The estates had been infamously mismanaged; the country had even been confronted with a balance on the wrong side.

Mr. C. S. READ asked the Secretary to the Treasury how the surveyor was paid?

Mr. STANSFELD said, the surveyor was paid out of the gross proceeds of the estates.

Mr. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he hoped the £35,000 for irrecoverable rents would be written off. He believed the amount was made up of quit rents due from Ireland during the last 120 years, and was accurately described in the Commissioners' Report as "irrecoverable."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,028, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings."

Mr. BENTINCK, in rising to call attention to the office of Director of Works and Buildings, and to move that the salary be reduced by the sum of £750, said, he meant to cast no reflection upon the gentleman to whose Office he had referred; his objections would be directed against the new system which had been inaugurated in the Department. He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury in his place, because the First Commissioner of Works, when questioned on these subjects, had invariably shifted the responsibility which ordinarily attached to his Office upon Cabinet Ministers; and there might now be an opportunity of ascertaining the views of the Government upon the most extraordinary alterations which had recently been made in this most important Office. The Office of Works had always had the direction of the architectural works belonging to the Government, and therefore the First Commissioner had associated with him architects of the greatest eminence. For many years that distinguished gentleman, Mr. Pennethorne, filled the post of salaried architect and surveyor, receiving as remuneration £1,500. He continued in that position until 1868 when Mr. Layard, becoming First Commissioner, proposed to divide the Office into two, so as to pay

Mr. Pennethorne £750, and appropriate the remainder to a new officer, to be called Inspector of Works and Buildings. The matter was referred to a committee of the Treasury, who approved of the suggested arrangement, at the same time expressing an opinion that the First Commissioner required the aid of an officer conversant in a high degree with architecture. Mr. Fergusson was accordingly appointed Inspector of Works and Buildings; but in pursuance of a previous intimation which he had given, resigned on the appointment of the present First Commissioner of Works. That right hon. Gentleman then united the functions previously discharged by Mr. Pennethorne and Mr. Fergusson in the office held by Captain Galton. However eminent Captain Galton might be as an engineer and in other respects, he was not an architect. The gallant gentleman himself did not profess to be one. The result of this arrangement was not discovered until the debate on the alleged dismissal of Mr. Barry. Then his right hon. Friend must see that in the resignation of Mr. Fergusson there was an opportunity for an entire reorganization of the duties of the Office. [Cries of "Agree!"] If interrupted, he should move to report Progress. He had a right to proceed without interruption. Mr. Layard denied all responsibility with regard to the mosaics in the roof of the Houses of Parliament. He said he had to take a Vote of the House, and hand the work over to the architect to carry it out. Captain Galton was appointed to carry out the work. And what were the fruits? A most lamentable failure in the only instances in which that officer had been called on to act. This was a real question of policy—of a departure from an established principle by his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner. Until this year the Office of Works had never been without an architect. His right hon. Friend deemed himself to be above experts, and in the proposal for improving the refreshment rooms, a portion of the plan consisted in breaking the continuity of one of the corridors in order that a scullery might be erected. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £750, the amount of the salary of Captain Galton.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £1,500, for the Salary of the Director of Works and Buildings be reduced by £750."—(Mr. Bentinck.)

Mr. GLADSTONE, while admitting that the substitution of Captain Galton for Mr. Pennethorne in the Office of Works was a very fair question for the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck) to raise, thought that many of the topics referred to by the hon. Gentleman were quite beside that question. He quite admitted that an important change had been made, and one which ought to invite the closest scrutiny of the House; but he must correct the hon. Gentleman on one particular. He said it had been determined to do away with architects in the Office of Works; but he mistook the state of things which had prevailed in that Office for a long time. He was correct in saying that for a great many years the First Commissioner had in connection with the establishment a consulting architect; but for a long period the consulting functions of Mr. Pennethorne had passed into abeyance, though he acted as practical architect of several works carried out under the Office. The termination of Mr. Pennethorne's connection with the Office of Works as consulting architect had not been brought about by his right hon. Friend the present First Commissioner. It had been determined on long before his right hon. Friend became First Commissioner. During all the years that the consulting functions of Mr. Pennethorne had fallen into abeyance, the Office of Works had really been without the advice of experts. It was rather soon to pronounce positively on the merits of the new system, but the Government thought it was a good one. It was not one by which the Office of Works was to proceed without an expert. In every considerable work it would have the assistance of architects, and it would on all occasions have the assistance of an expert in Captain Galton as Director of Works. The question was whether the Government had done right in calling in the assistance of Captain Galton, who was acquainted with construction and with the machinery employed in construction, but who was not a professional architect. The Government had reviewed the history of our public buildings, and, first of all, they came to the conclusion that, if the Office of Works were furnished by the assistance of a consulting architect, whose consulting functions were not placed in abeyance, results would constantly arise between him and the professional architects employed in connection with particular works. That conclusion was borne out by the fact that, in reality, Mr. Pennethorne had not acted as consulting architect for a very long time. So far from acceding to the sinister representations of the hon. Gentleman, as to the experience they had heretofore had, he would express a confident expectation that the working of the new arrangement would be found satisfactory even to the hon. Member himself. Independently of architectural taste, there were many questions on which it was desirable to have the advice of a practical man, and one who would not be ashamed to keep economy in view. In their great work, too, where they called in the assistance of special architects, it was most important to have the aid of a man who would look with the eye of an economist as well as of a constructor at the plans of those architects. Let them take their recent public works. There was the building in which they were assembled, which had cost between £3,500,000 and £4,000,000. If they had had well established in the Board of Works a competent adviser to the First Commissioner, who could have interfered with great knowledge and authority not as an architect, but as a constructor and an adviser with reference to economy, to check and control the execution of that vast Palace, he did not hesitate to affirm that an enormous saving would in all likelihood have been effected, and effected where it was greatly needed: for he owned he thought it a great reproach to the House of Commons during the last 30 years—and he must take his own share of it whatever that share might be—that they, as administrators of the public purse, had allowed such an unbounded expenditure upon the building in which they held their deliberations. Therefore, he did not say that at this moment they would claim for the new arrangement the assent and approval of the hon. Gentleman. The First Commissioner of Works himself had had great doubt and hesitation in regard to an opinion which was strongly maintained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but the measure had been adopted by the Government in its own responsibility. There was about it a fair promise of success. There was no man that the Office was not an architect, but a constructor, would fail into a sense of morality: and the wise course was to allow an arrangement which had only been in operation three months a reasonable time to work, say till next year. Then the Government would not discourage the hon. Member's endeavour to call the attention of the Committee to the subject; but would look with considerable confidence to its being sanctioned by the House.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE regarded the appointment of an Assistant Surveyor of Works as a starting-point of a new and vicious system against which he felt bound to protest. The new policy of the Government was to dispense with the services of eminent architects, and to entrust the architecture of our first public buildings to a mere subordinate in the Department of Works. He found his evidence in the circular advertisement which lately appeared in the public prints inviting competition for the office of assistant surveyor in the Board of Works, which stated that the candidates "must be competent to design, and to superintend the construction of buildings;" and, finally, as a remarkable qualification, they would have to be "capable of making technical reports properly composed and spelt." What, he asked, was the use of seeking out an official who was to be capable of superintending and designing buildings if he was not intended to do both? and what sort of an architect would the person be who would have to prove that he could compose those reports without committing errors in orthography? This, then, was to be the subordinate who was to be put in to prompt that Director of Works who was to be chosen because he was an engineer officer, although he might have no taste, no knowledge of the science of beauty, no knowledge of architectural symmetry and proportion, but would simply be a judge of construction and of material, and a practical builder. If, behind that engineer, behind that under-servant of the Department of Works the "assistant surveyor," there was not to be an architect of eminence, experience, and wide learning, of the class of those whom the nation had hitherto employed to construct its public buildings, what were they to say to the new system? After further referring to the list of qualifications required to be possessed by the candidate for the new office, the hon. Member said there was room for grave suspicion that it would be found to be a part of the new policy of the Department of Works, when fully revealed, that not only was a consulting architect to be dispensed with, but that they should not, in future, engage the services of any independent architect of European reputation such as Wren, Inigo Jones, Barry, Scott, or Street, whom the State had heretofore delighted to employ. The hon. Member concluded by asking for distinct assurances from the Government as to their real intentions in the matter, and by declaring that he would support the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck).

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to call attention to the extraordinary position in which successive changes had placed the Office of Works. When the present Government came into Office they appointed a small but effective Committee to consider the question; and the Committee presented a Report, which was acted upon by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the then First Commissioner of Works, who appointed Mr. Fergusson as a competent architectural authority to assist the Office of Works, Mr. Pennethorne still retaining his original position. Mr. Layard stated with great delight that the result would be a saving of many thousands a year, and he augured a period of success and satisfaction; but suddenly he went to Madrid. Mr. Fergusson disappeared, Mr. Pennethorne disappeared, and Captain Douglas Galton came in; and all this without further inquiry and without the issue of Papers to explain it. Of the architectural capacity of Captain Galton he knew nothing; and no answer had been given to the question of the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck)—namely, What is to be the architectural advice to which the Office of Works is to have resort? He gathered that it was not to be expected from Captain Galton. No doubt it would be a happy solution of the question if the Government were to say that, the Office being now denuded of first-rate architectural advice, no structural alterations should be made in any great building without the advice and assistance of the architect most competent to give it. It would be madness to trust any structural alteration of the Tower of London, for instance, to any architect who had not made such work his special study, and if it were the intention of the Government always to call in the most competent architect he should be quite content: but in the darkness which prevailed the hon. Member for Westminster had done good service by calling attention to the state of the matter.

MR. AYTON, having been accused of adopting an unprecedented course in seeking to make the Government responsible in cases such as had heretofore rested entirely with the First Commissioner of Works, wished to say that the position he had assumed from time to time had been based upon the statute law regulating his Office, and nothing could be more idle than for a person in Office to seek to inflate his position by assuming powers and authorities which did not belong to him. The truth was, that the Office of First Commissioner was entirely subservient to the Treasury; he was unable to undertake a single work, or to make any change in his Department, without the sanction of the Treasury; and, indeed, he had heard his Office described by a predecessor as little better than that of a superior Treasury clerk. This was not a very dignified view of the Office; but he thought it best that Members should keep within the line prescribed by the law. It had been suggested that he was engaged in dark mysteries, and to prove that he was concealing his operations, reference had been made to a printed pamphlet which explained to all the world what he was doing. In point of fact, what was being done was well known to all who would take the trouble to make inquiry; but misunderstanding would continue so long as hon. Members would undertake to criticize the proceedings of this Office without informing themselves accurately as to facts. He had already, on two occasions, explained this matter fully to the House, and yet remarks had been made at variance with his statements, and therefore he would for the third time explain the constitution of the Office. In the first instance, the office of consulting architect having degenerated almost into a sinecure, and that official being employed chiefly in works of construction, his predecessor, Mr. Leyard, made an arrangement for the honourable retirement of Mr. Pennethorne, who had been many years in the public service; who was not responsible for the fact that he had not been consulted; and whom there was no idea of dismissing, for he had held his office with considerable credit. Instead of appointing a consulting architect the Government created a new Office of Secretary of Works, and appointed a gentleman conversant with all questions appertaining to the discharge of his duties; but he found that the arrangement did not meet his views, and he determined to resign. And in reference to his case, again it was very unfortunate that such a term as disposal should be used. This happened before he accepted the Office of First Commissioner, and the retirement of this gentleman rendered it necessary to consider what should be done to make the Office of Works efficient for its purpose; and the arrangement made by the Government was that there should be in the Department an officer to be called the Director of Works, independently of him, or of a consulting architect, or of Mr. Fergusson. There was in the Office of Works, as there always had been, a body of gentlemen who were called assistant surveyors, a name calculated to mislead, because, in point of fact, they were architects, and the circular which had been quoted described their duties and qualifications. These gentlemen were always held qualified to undertake works of a general character, and they would continue to perform such duties; but the office of Director of Works was one of very great importance, and if he discharged his duty he would render very valuable service to the public. Before, however, an eminent architect was called in, there were always a number of preliminary questions connected with public works which required to be carefully considered and examined with a view to economy and efficiency; and it would be premature and attended with risk to hand over works to such architects before all preliminaries had been properly considered and dealt with. They had had experience of that in respect to the Foreign Office, which everybody complained of as being most inconvenient for the purposes of the service. It was to guard against danger of that kind that the Director of Works could be most usefully employed; and, when necessary, an architect of ability and genius would be called in for particular purposes. He ventured not to say that the result would be a saving not of thousands of pounds, but of hundreds of thousands in the course of the next few years.

MR. COLLINS suggested that the salary ought to be reduced not to £750, but to £1,000, which was a round sum.

Mr. AYRTON explained that this would be no saving, as Captain Galton's pension, added to his salary, would be more than £1,500, so that the office had made a good bargain in securing his services for £1,500.

Mr. COLLINS said, that might be true with regard to Captain Galton; but he wanted to fix the salary for the office in future times.

Mr. CANDLISH said, he thought it would be better to give compensation of £500 and fix the salary at £1,000.

Mr. MONK said, he had heard the speech of the First Commissioner of Works with astonishment. There were eight surveyors in the office, and according to his right hon. Friend they were all architects, and yet it was proposed to call in the occasional services of a ninth architect. If so, where was the use of a Director of Works? He certainly thought the Vote ought to be reduced to £1,000.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, that Captain Galton, in the way of mere pension, was entitled to £750 a year, irrespective of performing any duty, so that in fixing his salary at £1,500 a year the Government had not made a bad arrangement.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that in consequence of the Report of the Committee that a person of architectural skill should be selected, Mr. Fergusson was appointed; yet when that gentleman resigned, that recommendation was reversed without any fresh investigation, and a gentleman not an architect took his place.

Mr. COLLINS said, he thought the argument of the Prime Minister not a sound one, for the salary was voted for the office and not for the particular officer.

Mr. RYLANDS said, it was impossible for him not to see that the opposition to the item arose on account of the change made in reference to Mr. Barry, and not from a regard to the public interest. Now, as he held the old system to have been a very extravagant system, he would be no party to covert attacks on the reforms which the present Government had initiated.

Mr. BENTINCK said, that his object was not to reduce Captain Galton's salary, but to raise a discussion on the subject, although neither the Prime Minister nor the First Commissioner of Works had given any reason why an architect should not be employed.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £17,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services."

Mr. RYLANDS moved to reduce the Vote by the sum of £10,000. He did not intend to go into the general question; but he had reason to believe that in the expenditure for the Foreign Office certain amounts were devoted by the officials to augment the salaries or pensions of persons formerly employed in the Foreign Office. In the Select Committee on the Diplomatic and Consular Services he had put certain questions on the subject to some of the witnesses.

Mr. BOUVERIE rose to Order. The hon. Member was not entitled to refer to anything which had taken place before a Select Committee which had not yet reported to the House.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the rule undoubtedly was that until the Report of a Committee was laid before the House it was not regular for any Member of the Committee to refer to its proceedings.

Mr. RYLANDS said, he would only then say that as he had reason to believe that a portion of the secret service money voted by the House went to increase the salaries and pensions of persons formerly employed in the Foreign Office, he should move a reduction of the Vote in order that the expenditure might be submitted to the House. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs could not justify the expenditure of the money to the House, as he was entirely ignorant of the purposes to which it was applied, no one having any control over it except the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. There was another ground on which he entirely objected to the mode in which the secret service money was expended. It did not come under the examination of the Audit Department. In the opinion of the Committee on Public Accounts the Foreign Office, in declining to submit the expenditure of secret service money to the Audit Board, were guilty of a breach of the law—at all events, they did not fulfil the requirements of the law. What he wanted was a voucher that the amount voted by the House had been actually expended within the year; whereas, he had every reason to believe that there were at the present moment several thousand pounds of the secret service money in the hands of the Foreign Office unexpended. He thought this question deserved the attention of the Committee, and he moved the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £10,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £7,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services."
—(Mr. Rylands.)

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he wished, as this was but the fourth Vote they had been able to arrive at that evening, to lay before the Committee in a few words what he hoped would save them from an extended discussion on this subject. The subject of secret service money was a difficult and delicate one; but all he could say was it was totally impossible to dispense with it entirely; but the practice, the feeling, and the desire of the Government was to limit it, from time to time, as much as possible. That must, however, necessarily be done by a gradual process; because, where funds of this kind had been given, the mode of disposing of them fell into shapes which involved considerable expectations for the future. It was, therefore, a very gradual process by which the House of Commons must be content to walk if it sought to reduce the amount of secret service money annually voted. There were two things he was desirous to say. He did not think his hon. Friend, if initiated into the mysteries of this department of the public service, would find that the expenditure of this money was open to the imputations he had directed against it. But with regard to a public audit of secret service money, that amounted to a contradiction in terms. It would be very objectionable to institute a secret audit, and he should not like the Audit Commissioners to perform their work in secrecy. The principle on which Parliament had always proceeded was this—that if it was necessary to allow something in the nature of secret service money, the best mode of dealing with it rested on these two conditions—first of all to confine the knowledge of it to the smallest possible number of persons, and, having thus concentrated responsibility, to trust to their honour and discretion. He did not think they could obtain a better system for the management of the thing than that. Nor had his hon. Friend, in the present state of the case, reason to be dissatisfied. Great progress had been made towards the establishment of strict economy and moderation in regard to this Vote. With the exception of six months, during which he was Secretary for the Colonies, 24 years ago, he never knew one syllable as to the administration of the secret service money. He remembered perfectly well when the sum annually voted was £38,000; then it was reduced to £32,000. It remained at £32,000 for a considerable number of years. Within the last few years it had gradually been brought down. The last sum asked for was £27,000, and this year it was down to £25,000. Until this year the Foreign Office had been entitled to retain the unexpended balance of secret service money; but in future the balance at the close of the year would be restored to the Treasury. The immediate effect of that concession, however, must necessarily be to keep up the sum voted, as there must be a small margin beyond what would be necessary to meet immediate demands. He hoped the statement he had made would save the time of the Committee.

Mr. DILLWYN observed, that a voucher from the hands of the Foreign Secretary that the sum voted by the House had been expended would be quite sufficient for all practical purposes.

ARMY ENLISTMENT BILL.—[Bill 106.]
(Mr. Secretary Cardwell, Captain Fivian.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Colonel BARTTELOT said, that some of the most experienced officers were of opinion that the Secretary of State ought not to have the power of putting into the Reserve men who had served only three years in the artillery, the cavalry, and the engineers. They thought the period should be extended to seven years. He concurred in that opinion, and, therefore, he begged to move, in Clause 4, line 25, to leave out "Army service," and insert—"the infantry, and seven years in the cavalry, artillery, and engineers."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 25, to leave out the words "Army service," in order to insert the words "the infantry, and seven years in the cavalry, artillery, and engineers,"—(Colonel Barttelot,)—instead thereof.

MR. CARDWELL said, he hoped the House would adhere to the decision they had come to in Committee. The hon. and gallant Gentleman having been defeated when he brought forward a somewhat similar Motion in Committee now attempted to go still further. In Committee the hon. and gallant Gentleman moved five years.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, that the figure five got into the Amendment instead of seven, owing to the mistake of one of the clerks.

MR. CARDWELL said, that at all events the Committee decided against five years, and now the House was asked to adopt seven years. The proposal in the 4th clause was not one to fix the time the soldier should serve, but the minimum of time at which it would be competent to the Secretary of State to remove him into the Reserve if he were not further required for active service. At present the soldier was enlisted for 12 years, or as long within that period as Her Majesty might require his services. After the Indian Mutiny it became necessary to considerably reduce the Army, and no one could forget the moral effects which resulted from throwing a large number of men out of employment. The proposal in the Bill was one in the interest of the soldier and of the nation, because it enabled the Secretary of State to place in the Reserve soldiers who had served for three years. He was astonished that hon. and gallant Gentlemen who had the interest of the soldiers at heart should oppose such a proposition. No doubt it took a longer time to train a cavalry, artillery, or engineer than an infantry soldier; but that had nothing to do with the proposal. What he said was this—that it would be far better, both for the soldiers and the public, that the Secretary of State should have power to put the men into the Reserve than, as had been done in former instances, that they should be suddenly disbanded and turned out upon the country without any provision whatever. He trusted that the House would adhere to the decision which it had already arrived at.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, the right hon. Gentleman was under an entire misapprehension as to the views of hon. Gentleman on the Opposition side of the House. Those hon. Gentlemen did not wish to place any difficulty in the way of increasing the Reserve; but what they protested against was the short period of enlistment. The men should be enlisted for 10 or 12 years, and then, if it were necessary, every facility should be given them to leave the active Army at any time, and to pass into the Army of Reserve, their places in the active Army being filled by recruits. The right hon. Gentleman had got rid of a great many more soldiers than he was likely soon to get in the Army of Reserve. He had got rid of 23,000 men in the course of two years, and he (Sir Percy Herbert) wished to know if the country would not give a great deal, under the circumstances of the present moment, to have those men back again. At the present moment—and he challenged contradiction on this point—we were without a single battalion which was fit for service, or fit even to form part of our Army of Occupation for Belgium. ["Oh!"] He was quite prepared for those cries. But perhaps hon. Gentlemen were not aware that we were bound by honour and by our treaties to ensure the neutrality of Belgium, and to defend her against aggression. Had not every one seen in the papers the demand addressed by the French Government to Belgium, whether it was able to defend its neutrality, and did they suppose that the French or the Prussian Government, either of which was equally suspicious, would have asked such a question if there were a corps of 25,000 British soldiers occupying the line of the Scheldt, without menace, but with a determination to uphold the Treaty? The present Government was mainly the same as that we had 16 years ago. He repeated, what was matter of notoriety, that many impartial men were of opinion that it was owing to the character of the late Earl of Aberdeen and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government that the Crimean War had broken out. For the Emperor of Russia and his Minister could not believe, after the speeches that had been made, that the British Government would ever go to war. He warned the Government not to be too sure that the same thing would not occur again. A very pacific Government, which took every step and precaution to prevent its country from being in a fit state for defence was the very Government of all others which was likely to force a manly nation like England into war. Other nations knew the unprepared state of such a country, and placed affronts upon her which they would never venture to offer under other circumstances. Our regiments now mustered only 500 on paper; on parade they did not average 300, and if we were to send 25 battalions into Belgium to-morrow they would not average more than 300 each. He would, therefore, support the Amendment.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to see England with a good Army of Reserve; but he did not wish to see that Army created at the expense of the regular Army. He was surprised the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had not taken a hint from the late Division on this subject. Every military man who had supported him with regard to the line, had voted against him when it was a question that concerned the cavalry and artillery. The opinion of the Army was most decidedly against the Bill.

MR. LIDDELL implored the House to discuss this measure wholly apart from the question of war, and to discuss it only from a national point of view. We had a perfect right to discuss the great question of the organization of our Army, or the creation of a Reserve Force wholly independent of any circumstances that might exist abroad. He regretted extremely to have heard an eminent British soldier (Sir Percy Herbert) whom they all respected, and whose distinguished services had been of so much value to his country, declare that there was not a single battalion of the British Army which was fit for protective services, and he hoped that it was not a well-founded statement; but he hoped the whole question would be discussed calmly, and wholly apart from those circumstances which they all deplored, but in which they had no part, and in which they intended to take no part.

MAJOR ALLEN said, he would not allude to the question of war or no war; but he would like very much to know whether the officers of the Royal Artillery, who were competent to form a sound opinion upon such a matter as this, had been at all consulted as to the short period of enlistment which was proposed under it. From the time he had served in the Royal Artillery, he was led to believe that anything short of seven years' permanent service would reduce that branch of the profession to an utter nullity.

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT held that the special services of the Army should be dealt with distinctly from the line. What he and those who thought with him decried was that a matter which involved the success of the Army should be left to the option of any Secretary of State. With reference to his own corps, the Engineers, he knew, as a matter of fact, that the force at Chatham was for three years under instruction. Nominally it was for a year and a-half; but, from one cause or another, in practice it came to this—that the force of Engineers was three years under instruction. If, therefore, this Bill were put in force, the whole time of the Engineers would be spent practically under instruction.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER believed that the point which hon. and gallant Gentlemen wished to see carried out could be effected by the Bill.

MAJOR DICKSON said, that if the Amendment were negatived the material of cavalry regiments would be entirely destroyed, for it was impossible to make a soldier in three years. The right hon. Gentleman wished to have power to discharge soldiers in case of a war coming to a sudden termination; but that power he had already under Acts which he had stated would remain in force. Those, however, were the very men who ought not to be turned away when they were approaching the close of their service. He trusted the House would accept the Amendment.

MR. WHITWELL said, the Bill had two objects in view. One was to increase the power of enlistment, the other was to form an Army of Reserve. He believed the Bill was calculated to effect both objects. The Bill did not limit the power of the Secretary of State for War, nor require him to discharge troops; but it only enabled him to do so if he found the men were ready to be discharged into the Reserve.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, no one disputed that more men would enlist under the Bill; but the question was, whether they would be worth having after they had got them. The opinion expressed by cavalry officers was decidedly to the effect that cavalry soldiers in an Army of Reserve would be of little use.

AN HON. MEMBER said, that if men were enlisted for so short a period as three years, power would be taken out of the hands of commanding officers to promote young hands to be non-commissioned officers, and which would have the effect of weakening the regiment. The power was not to refuse men going into the Reserve; but what was wanted was to make a man a perfect soldier and then let him join the Reserve.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, that hon. and gallant Gentlemen opposite seemed to think that it was the intention of his right hon. Friend to dismiss every soldier, whether infantry or cavalry, at the end of three years. As one who had served Her Majesty, he should take exception to any such provision; but there was no such intention in the Bill. Soldiers would be enlisted, as before, for a period of 12 years; but circumstances might happen which would render it desirable to dismiss a large number before that period had expired, and by this Bill his right hon. Friend would be able to release them on paying them a small retaining fee instead of being obliged to disband and dismiss them without making any payments. If hon. and gallant Gentlemen understood that, they would not oppose this clause, which would be very advantageous to the soldier.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would not take upon himself the responsibility of voting against the Amendment at this juncture, as it was supported by so many hon. and gallant Members, who had a practical knowledge of the subject.

Question put, "That the words 'Army service' stand part of the Bill."

GUN LICENCES BILL—[BILL 184.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stansfeld)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved the omission in Clause 7, line 21, after "thereof," of the words "or upon lands in the occupation of the owner of the gun."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 21, to leave out the words "or upon lands in the occupation of the owner of the gun."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. C. S. READ protested against omitting these words, which were essential to the fair protection of small farmers, in whose case it was more necessary that they should carry a gun on their own lands, and he would feel compelled to take the sense of the House on the point.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, the reason why the hon. Baronet wished to reverse the decision at which the House arrived on a previous occasion, was because the words would enable persons in easy means to shoot other than game, over large tracts of land, without any licence.

MR. PELL believed the Bill to be a most objectionable one, observing that the number of exemptions had been extended from two to six since the Bill had been introduced, and that other exemptions would have to be made. How, for instance, he should like to know, was it proposed to deal with a man who had changed his residence? He would certainly support in a Division his hon. Friend (Mr. C. S. Read).

MR. COLLINS said, he thought that instead of dividing now, it would be better to take the opinion of the House on the Amendment of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given Notice.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 123: Majority 89.

MR. HAMBRO moved, in Clause 7, sub-section 2, line 34, after "constable," to insert "owner or occupier or any person having a licence under this Act." Under the existing law only a police-constable or a revenue officer could make such a demand.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was willing to confer such a power on owners and occupiers, but not on persons having a licence.

Amendment agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, in Clause 7, after line 36, insert—

"4. By the occupier of any lands which are cultivated solely by his own labour using or carrying a gun for the purpose only of scaring birds or of killing vermin on such lands, or by any person using or carrying a gun for the purpose only of scaring birds or of killing vermin on any lands by order of the occupier thereof, who shall have in force a licence or certificate to kill game or a licence under this Act.

"5. By any gunsmith or his servant carrying a gun in the ordinary course of the trade of a gunsmith, or using a gun by way of testing or regulating its strength or quality in a place specially set apart for the purpose.

"6. By any person carrying a gun in the ordinary course of his trade or business as a common carrier."

Motion agreed to.

MR. HAMBRO gave Notice that he would move on the third reading that these exceptions be extended to those acting by the order of the persons excepted from the tax.

MR. DYCE NICOL, in moving that this Bill do not extend to Scotland, protested against any such additional tax being imposed on the Scotch agriculturists; none could be more unpopular with the middle and lower classes of that country. This Bill, as originally proposed, was a substitute for the game licence; but that being given up, it was simply an additional burden upon the industrious tenantry, with a string of exemptions, affording a fertile source of dispute, and having the still more lamentable effect of increasing that unhappy feeling which now existed in Scotland on the subject of the Game Laws, and which the speech delivered yesterday by the Lord Advocate was calculated so much to embitter. This was a tax to which the great mass of the people in Scotland would not quietly submit; and he told the Prime Minister that, highly and deservedly as his great public services were appreciated in Scotland, the manner in which its interests were now being treated was causing there a feeling of alienation from his Government and general discontent throughout the country.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PEDLARS' CERTIFICATES BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.)

[BILL 199.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. M'LAREN made an appeal to the Government not to proceed with the measure at that late hour. He said that there were several Amendments on the Paper, and he had given Notice of several others which he intended to press to a Division; but so little did he anticipate the Bill going through Committee at that hour that he had only a short time previously given to the Clerk his Amendments for the purpose of having them placed on the Votes. He considered that it was most improper to proceed with the Bill at present, and that if they did so it would be a direct violation of the understanding that no opposed Bill would be taken after half-past 12 o'clock. He moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. BRUCE said, it had been introduced in accordance with an assurance given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the expressed wishes of the chief constables of counties. The Amendments, he thought, might be got through in a few minutes.

MR. MUNTZ said, he hoped the hon. Member for Edinburgh would not press his Amendment, for the Bill had become necessary as a corollary to the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. M'LAREN said, the provisions of the Bill were most arbitrary, and he protested against its being proceeded with at that hour in violation of the undertaking given by the Prime Minister. He would not give way, but would move the adjournment of the House rather.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the Bill was too important to be discussed at so late an hour.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Grant of certificate).

Mr. M'LAREN said, that he had an Amendment to move to one of the sub-sections of this clause. By one of the provisions of the Bill, it was only the chief officer of police who was permitted to grant a certificate to a hawker. Now, according to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was desirable that pedlars should be allowed, without requiring any licence, to carry free trade into every little village in the country in order to enable the people distant from towns to get goods at a cheap rate. It was therefore not devised as a police measure at all; but since its introduction the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary seemed to have undergone a change, and hence this was a mere Police Bill. Under this clause, a magistrate, whether of a burgh or a county, could not grant a certificate to any pedlar or hawker. The certificate must, in all cases, be from the chief officer of the police; so that, in point of fact, the power was entirely handed over to that functionary. He considered that such a power was of the most arbitrary character; and in some places with which he was acquainted, he knew that the chief officer of the police was entirely under the control of a small police committee, composed of men who would not allow a single person to get a pedlar's certificate to trade in the county if they could prevent it. He thought such a power might well be vested in the hands of the magistrates of Scotland, and he reminded the Committee that under the new system there would be a far stricter surveillance over hawkers than there was at the present moment, because licences by the old law were granted by the Excise, and the greatest vagabond in the kingdom could get a hawker's licence if he chose to pay the duty. In future no certificate was to be granted except by the chief officer of police who would thus have every pedlar in his power. The Amendments which he proposed, and which he had given to the Clerk to get printed, was to insert the words "or any magistrate, if the person applying for the licence be known to the magistrate to be of good character." He thought there ought to be strong reasons shown why the magistrates ought not to have this power.

Mr. BRUCE said, that the question had been carefully considered, and the magistrates after all would have to rely upon the information of the police.

Mr. M'LAREN said, that he should be quite satisfied if the licence were granted by the magistrates after hearing the statement of the chief officer of police respecting the character of the applicants. If that suggestion was adopted, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in line 30, to leave out the words "chief officer of police of the police district," in order to insert the words "magistrates in petty sessions assembled."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 46: Majority 26.

Mr. ANDERSON moved to insert after the words "chief officer of police," the following:—"And in case of his refusal, subject to appeal to the magistrates assembled at petty sessions."

Mr. BRUCE said, that if the hon. Member would withdraw the Amendment, he would take care that those words should be inserted in the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Effect of certificate).

Mr. M'LAREN said, that he had an Amendment to move. By the clause, as it at present stood, if a pedlar got a certificate from the chief constable of a burgh it would not enable him to hawk his goods in the county in which it was situated; and if he got it in the county he could not hawk within the burgh. Now that was a decided infringement of the liberty of the subject. The pedlar had as much right, as far as he could see, to be protected against such arbitrary restrictions in carrying on his trade as any other person. The law would work in the most injurious manner. In many parts of the country he knew that there was such a strong feeling against keeping up cottages, which the landlords deemed superfluous, that poor people labouring in rural districts were obliged to come into the towns to sleep, and, of course, they bought everything they wanted before they went out into the fields to their labour. But it was for the sake of the poor people residing in the country that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to take off the licence on pedlars, that they could go from door to door and supply the wants of country people on free trade principles.

CANADIAN FRONTIER—CANADIAN VOLUNTEER MILITIA. — RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, when I placed on the Paper the Resolution I am about to move we were in ignorance of the great events which were about to burst upon us. Had I known what was coming I might, perhaps, have refrained from giving that Notice; but, under all the circumstances of the case, I do not regret having done so, because it will tend, I think, to show to your Lordships the necessity of being prepared to meet contingencies which we cannot at present foresee. We are at the commencement of a great European war. We trust we may not be involved in it; but the extent to which it may develop itself no man can possibly foretell; and it is, therefore, I conceive, but common prudence that at such a crisis we should endeavour to set our House in order, and prepare ourselves for whatever eventualities the future may have in store. It is in the recollection of every one how five or six years ago Fenianism came into existence. After having struggled in vain for some time in Ireland to give effect to the spirit of disloyalty and disaffection, baffled and crippled, it took refuge on the other side of the Atlantic, and in 1866 an invasion of considerable magnitude broke on the Canadian frontier. The circumstances and results are too well known to make it necessary that I should recapitulate them. Fortunately there was a large number of British troops there, and the spirit of the Canadian Volunteers was excellent. The invasion was immediately repelled, and the schemes of the Fenians were baffled. In the following year assassination was substituted for open attack, and there occurred the murder of Mr. Darcy McGee, one of the most eminent Canadian statesmen, under the instigation of Fenian conspirators. Since then there have been repeated warnings from time to time along the Canadian frontier, and within the last few months once more an attempt at Fenian invasion was made. On the 22nd of May a concentration of Fenian levies commenced, arms and ammunition were served out, and a so-called General assumed the command. On the 25th an attack was made, but it was happily baffled without loss of life to any of our own troops or to the Canadians engaged. On the following day the attack was renewed, when it was again repulsed. The United States Government issued a proclamation during the course of these proceedings, warning their people against allowing themselves to be mixed up in these movements; and after the first defeat they arrested the Fenian general. They also sent troops to the frontier on the occasion of the second attack. I think that, looking to these facts, we must be sensible of the intentions of the United States' Government. We may regret that it was beyond their power to send troops to the frontier in sufficient time to stop the attack altogether, but their good intentions were marked, and anyone conversant with American affairs knows the political difficulties by which the United States Government are surrounded in such a case. If, however, there is any room for regret on the ground of delay in respect of the conduct of that Government, there can happily be none as to the conduct of the Canadian Volunteers. Some of them, at a few days' notice, called away from their various occupations, men whose time was money, and who freely ventured their fortunes and their lives on the issue without a moment's hesitation—without the default, I believe of a single individual—one and all repaired to the post of duty. They acted, as they were sure to do, with the utmost spirit and gallantry. And happily they did not stand alone; for on that occasion a young Prince, the son of our Sovereign, influenced by that spirit of courage which has never been wanting to his race, marched with the English troops fortunately not yet withdrawn from Canada, and added fresh confidence to the ranks of the Canadian Volunteers. On that day the Empire and the Crown were both represented, and Canada felt that she was an integral part of the Empire. I have, therefore, with little fear of a refusal, to ask your Lordships to agree to this Resolution—

"That this House has learnt with satisfaction that Her Majesty's regular troops were united with the Canadian volunteer militia in their prompt and vigorous efforts in defence of the Canadian frontier of the Empire from the recent so-called Fenian invasion."

But it has been hinted to me that Her Majesty's Government find some difficulty in assenting to this Resolution. I shall deeply regret should this be the case. I have endeavoured so to frame it as to avoid any possible cause of offence, and to render it easy for them to accept it. I shall deeply regret if this Resolution is opposed by Her Majesty's Government, both for the effect it may have in this country and still more in Canada. I am indeed totally at a loss to understand on what ground the Government can find fault with such a Resolution, which expresses an almost universal opinion, and which contains not a single word that is not an admitted fact. Until, then, I hear from the lips of my noble Friend the grounds of his objection, I shall not take up the time of the House upon this point. My first object in bringing forward this Motion is to render the acknowledgments which are due not only to the troops, but to the Canadian Volunteers for their gallantry; but my second object, which I approach with much greater difficulty, is to indicate to the House and the Government what I believe to be the feeling at this moment of the people of Canada. Now, everyone who knows anything of Canadian matters, knows that if there is a people with whom loyalty is not a mere profession it is the Canadians. They have grown up in feelings of loyalty to such an extent that it has become a ruling and an almost passionate sentiment. My knowledge of Canada runs back now for many years, and I can testify that the Canadians, in point of loyalty and devotion to the Crown, are absolutely more English than the English themselves. But with this feeling that ever animates them there is mingled at this moment another feeling—a feeling of great soreness and irritation. Now, what is the cause of that? I believe the cause to be a belief—though I trust that it is totally unfounded—that it is the settled policy of the Government of this country to abandon, as far as possible, their connection with Canada. That belief rests not so much upon words spoken as upon acts which are supposed to indicate the policy of the Government—it is supposed to be corroborated by the withdrawal of our ships from the neighbouring waters—a step which I regret, because if there is one question of Imperial rather than of colonial policy, it is the presence of English ships at the fisheries—and by the withdrawal of our troops from Canada. I wish I could think that I was labouring under a mistake in respect to this feeling on the part of the Canadians; but I found my conviction on this subject not only on letters which I have received from men whose honour and knowledge is undoubted—not only on the statement of friends of long standing who have communicated with me—not only upon the representations of newspapers of every shade of political opinion—but also upon the meetings which have been held and the addresses to the Crown which have been adopted. One and all believe—I trust wrongly—that there has been more or less an intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to depart from the connection with Canada, and throughout the length and breadth of Canada there is a feeling of deep and intense soreness. At the commencement of the Session I ventured to warn the noble Earl, who was then Secretary for the Colonies, that Fenian attacks on Canada were not impossible this year, but he ridiculed the notion.

EARL GRANVILLE: I beg the noble Earl's pardon. He alluded to attempts which were being made, and I said I had not heard of them.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I think that, if the noble Earl looks back to the records of the time to which I advert, he will find that he threw the utmost discredit on the possibility of an attack on Canada by Fenians.

EARL GRANVILLE: Certainly not.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: Well, I am bound by the noble Earl's disclaimer; but, at all events, I was alive at that moment to the serious risk of a Fenian invasion, and I at the same time pointed out the feeling of soreness which I believed to exist in the minds of the Canadians at the supposed policy of Her Majesty's Government. That feeling, I grieve to say, has since increased in intensity; and I must own that there are reasons why it should exist. Every Spring, since 1866, there has been the threat, at least, of Fenian attacks. Every year, more or less, Canada has been placed in great difficulties and exposed to great expense. So long as she knows that she has the entire sympathy and support of this country those difficulties will be cheerfully borne; but if doubts are allowed to arise on this vital point, then it is natural enough that her feeling should be one of anxiety and dissatisfaction. If every year French troops or Volunteers were drilling at Havre with the avowed object of invading this country, we should have reason to expect the deepest soreness in England; yet that has been precisely the case with Canada for the last four or five years. Moreover, it must be remembered that, whatever may be the cause of Fenianism, Canada suffers from it entirely through her connection with us. No reasonable man can doubt that if Canada were not attached to the British Empire Fenianism would leave Canada alone. And I fear that unless this feeling is checked it may grow. I know that there are some persons in this country—a very small section—who believe that the connection with Canada is one of trifling importance to us. But your Lordships will not be misled for a moment by such an idea. It is sometimes argued as if it were a question of the independence of Canada; but it is and must be a question of annexation to the United States. And what does annexation mean? It means to this country the loss of the fisheries, the loss of the great commercial marine of Canada, numbering nearly 40,000 sailors, the loss of every port on that Continent, the loss of trade, which may be ten-fold that which exists at the present moment, the loss of staunch allies, the loss of a great Empire. Moreover, it is not only a positive but a relative loss, for it means the addition to the United States of all these elements of power, and the departure of Canada with feelings of irritation and illwill towards us. God forbid that that should ever happen! Some, no doubt, may say that such things should not even be hinted at; but there are times when it is right the truth should be told, that men may see the drift of circumstances, and not disregard the warning of facts. Supposing such a catastrophe to occur, what would History say of us? It would proclaim that we were more stupid, more infatuated than the men who 100 years ago threw away the United States. It would say, and say justly, that we sinned with our eyes open—that we had had every warning which reasonable men could look for, and that we had entirely disregarded them. And what would Canada say? She would say that we had encouraged her in confederating the British North American Provinces, and that when we had induced her to adopt that great measure of policy in an unworthy and pitiful manner, we washed our hands of the responsibility. And lastly, what would this country say? She would say that while she had placed in power the strongest Government that had existed for years, that Government deliberately allowed to be alienated hearts than whom there were none more loyal throughout the Empire; and that Parliament, while discussing details of legislation like a parochial vestry, had lost or destroyed the greatest Empire the world had ever seen. I venture to say that a Government of which that could be said would not be worth six weeks' purchase. I do not, however, wish to wrong Her Majesty's Government, and I hope that false intentions have been attributed to them; but I say that if there ever has been the slightest intention on their part to abandon Canada they do not represent the feeling of England, which is just as English in this matter as it has ever been. As long as Canada clings to England, loves the English connection, and is prepared to submit to sacrifice and danger—greater indeed than we are likely to be called upon to submit to—England will never allow one inch of Canadian soil to be surrendered or sacrificed. This leads me on to the question of the withdrawal of the Imperial troops. In the early part of the Session I pressed the noble Earl, who was then at the Colonial Office, to state the views of the Government on that subject, and I heard with grief that, in their opinion, the time had come for the entire withdrawal of the troops from Canada. On asking him again later in the Session, when this Fenian invasion had occurred, nearly the same question, the noble Earl stated that Her Majesty's Government had consented, at all events, to suspend the order for the recall of the troops. I rejoiced at that announcement; and my earnest hope is that the Government may carry that intention a little further, and delay for a still longer time a withdrawal which I am convinced will be fraught with deep mischief—a withdrawal which is not only unnecessary to any part of their colonial policy, but to which they are pledged by no conceivable reason—not even by the Report of the House of Commons' Committee, which sat six or seven years ago on Colonial Administration. I object to the withdrawal of the troops as unjust to Canada and highly inexpedient to the interests of the Empire. I say unjust to Canada, because you have encouraged her to enter into this great Confederation; and I venture to say that if, when that measure was before Parliament, it had been announced that its immediate result would be the withdrawal of every British regiment from Canada except a garrison at Halifax, it would not have been sanctioned by Parliament, and certainly would not have been accepted by Canada. You have induced her, moreover, on the faith of her connection with England, to lay out the Intercolonial Railway on military principles, to devote upwards of a million for fortifications, and to incur a great annual expense in training her Militia. You have from the same point of view imposed, directly and indirectly, many burdens on Canada, and Canada has made no mean return. She has freely accepted each burden and responsibility. She has no desire that all her charges should be paid for her. On the contrary, in this Red River Expedition she has cheerfully consented to supply three-fourths of the men and three-fourths of the money. She has consented to station ships at the fisheries in lieu of those you have taken off. She has embodied for permanent service for the next two years two entire regiments, which at the end of that time will be as completely organized and as effective as any Imperial troops. She has declined no military charge or expense. She has formed schools of practical instruction for her officers, and at this moment, at considerable cost, is prepared to form great military camps. It may, but I trust it will not, be said that because Canada has done so much, therefore we may do very little or nothing. That would be an argument unworthy of this country and this House. I know, indeed, it is said that you expect Canada to provide for her internal defence. She is prepared to do so, and has never dreamt of anything else. But I maintain that Fenianism, proceeding from the American border, cannot be classed under the head of internal defence and order. In the interests of the Empire, I assume that you wish to retain Canada as an integral part of the Empire; but every military man knows well that it is not safe to trust entirely to any Volunteer or Militia force, however gallant it may be. You must have regular troops, it may be in very small proportions, a mere handful—and I would gladly leave the Government to decide the proportion—but you ought to have a certain proportion of regular troops, in order to give moral support and confidence to the Volunteers and to form a nucleus round which they may rally at any time. This is the view of every officer of eminence, and of some of the highest authorities in this country. Before the House of Commons' Committee to which I have referred the Duke of Newcastle and Lord Herbert laid down that principle. They never contemplated the entire withdrawal of Imperial troops, but they thought that two or three regiments should remain as a nucleus round which Volunteers would be collected. You say you intend to retain Halifax as an Imperial fort; but does anybody believe that to maintain Halifax will be sufficient? It would be exactly like a man locking his front door and leaving every window and back door open for persons to walk in at. It is true troops might, under favourable conditions, be sent from Halifax to Quebec or any threatened point; but we are in the habit of forgetting how great the distances are in Canada. Under very favourable circumstances, it took the Imperial authorities five or six days at the time of the Trent affair to convey troops by land from Halifax to Quebec. It is true that the Intercolonial Railway will facilitate the movements of troops; but till its completion you must send them by road and along the frontier:—and I would therefore urge the importance of maintaining a certain proportion of regular troops, let it be ever so small, till the completion of that railway. Retain, if you please, but one regiment at Montreal, and under any circumstances a regiment of infantry and one battery of artillery at Quebec. In two or two and a-half years the railway will be completed, and you may then reconsider the whole question. And I urge this the more strongly as this country has already expended, I think, £250,000 on the fortifications of Quebec, and the Canadian Parliament have already voted a very large sum to add to those fortifications. That regiment of infantry and battery of artillery would form a practical school of instruction for all the troops which may be raised in Canada. Remember, also, that Quebec with these fortifications has become a place of no mean strength. He who holds Quebec probably holds Canada; and to any objection that the troops might be cut off or jeopardized my answer is first, that the force I ask is really insignificant, and next that anyone who has studied the question knows that Montreal is supported by Quebec, Quebec by Halifax, and Halifax—the base of our operations—by the naval supremacy of England—so that there is a complete chain from one to the other, which ought to insure the safety of the troops. Discussion on this subject may be very disagreeable to Her Majesty's Government, but I am convinced that within the whole wide range of English politics there is no question which possesses greater importance. It is really the question of the Empire which is at stake—an Empire greater than any ever conceived by the mind of man—greater perhaps than the strength or wisdom of man has ever before formed. Our possessions in the Western Hemisphere alone amount to an Empire. You have a boundless tract of territory which is open to every English subject—a territory where every Englishman can go freely and settle, buy land, and attain every step in civil life as freely as he can in England—a land where emigration is welcomed, where pauperism is almost unknown, where the English language is spoken, and where English institutions flourish; nay, more, a land where the practical difficulties of maintaining the connection with this country are day by day diminishing, and which steam and electricity and all the appliances of modern science are bringing into closer relations with us. On the other hand, our relations to Canada have been and are political rather than colonial. It is the only one of our Colonies whose border is continuous with a great foreign Power. Those relations must, therefore, be political, and on the horizon of Canada clouds must from time to time appear. Hence it is incumbent on the British Government to devote more than usual care and trouble to Canada—a task worthy of English statesmen and the English Parliament. But what is really required is very little—only a few words and a few slight acts. Let Her Majesty's Government so speak that Canada may feel that she is an integral part of the British Empire, and that as long as she clings to the connection and is prepared to endure sacrifice and peril for it she is as much a portion of the Empire as any English county; and let the Government by their Acts, however slight, show every foreign nation, in the words of Mr. Canning, that where the flag of England flies there foreign domination shall never come.

Moved to resolve, That this House has learnt with satisfaction that Her Majesty's regular troops were united with the Canadian volunteer militia in their prompt and vigorous efforts in defence of the Canadian frontier of the Empire from the recent so-called Fenian invasion.—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, in all that my noble Friend said at the commencement of his speech, as to the conduct of the Canadian Volunteers, I need hardly say I most cordially agree. Nothing could exceed the efficiency, the promptitude, the energy and discipline which they displayed in repelling the most unjustifiable and wanton aggression to which they were subjected by the Fenians. My noble Friend (Earl Granville), while holding the Office which I have now the honour to fill, more than once expressed his sense of their conduct; and I will take this opportunity of reading and laying on the Table the despatch in which my noble Friend recorded the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on their services. It is dated the 5th of July, and is addressed to Sir John Young. It runs thus—

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch, No. 132, of the 9th ult., with its enclosures relating to the recent Fenian raid. I have read with sustained interest the graphic accounts given by Colonel Smith and Colonel Bagot, of the two affairs which resulted in the repulse and rout of the Fenians on the Missisquoi and Huntingdon frontiers. I have sincere pleasure in acknowledging the conduct of the officers, the courage, alacrity, and discipline of the Volunteers and Militia, and the zeal and helpful enthusiasm of the farmers and country people on both the points of attack. The discredit and ridicule attaching to these marauders on account of their signal overthrow when they had scarcely crossed the frontier must cripple, if not utterly destroy the means of re-organizing expeditions as wicked and unjustifiable in their conception as they have proved to be feeble and unsuccessful in their execution. The genuine admiration of the spirit and behaviour of the Canadian levies which pervades the reports of Colonel Smith and Colonel Bagot is the best evidence that their easy success is not so much due to the character of their opponents as to the intrinsic qualities of the Canadians—the promptitude, courage, and intelligence which makes individuals distinguished and a nation great."

I should, indeed, regret it if the Government had been grudging in their expressions of admiration at the conduct of the Volunteers. The Resolution of my noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) couples with the Volunteers the regular troops, who had on that occasion very little opportunity of displaying the gallantry which always characterizes them. They undoubtedly did their duty and gave their support to the Volunteers; but the whole part they took consisted in one company being engaged in a very slight skirmish. My noble Friend has rightly anticipated that I should not be able to assent to his Resolution. The grounds on which I ask the House not to assent to it are very simple. In the first place, it appears rather singular that my noble Friend, with his genuine admiration for the conduct of the Volunteers, should by a side wind rather imply that had the regular troops not been present they would have been unable to repel the attack. [The Earl of CARNARVON said, he certainly had no such meaning.] The words of the Resolution are certainly open to that interpretation. My second objection is that, however stronger our feelings may be of the services performed by the Volunteers, we must measure the occasion by what actually occurred; and considering that this was a raid of certain marauders in time of peace, who were driven back, after they had advanced only a few hundred yards over the frontier, in a way as discreditable to them as it was creditable to the Volunteers, it would be very unusual and quite contrary to precedent that this House should by solemn declaration record its sense of the services of the troops and Volunteers for such an action. If, therefore, my noble Friend perseveres with his Resolution, I shall be obliged to move the Previous Question. As to the general topics on which my noble Friend adverted at great length, it is very difficult to satisfy him on these questions of colonial policy. He has more than once asked what policy the Government intended to pursue as regards the withdrawal of troops from the Colonies, and declarations from this side are of exceedingly little use to him, for he invariably returns to the charge by saying that not much weight can be attached to them. When he insists so strongly on the impolicy of withdrawing troops from the Colonies as dangerous to the integrity of the Empire, I am bound to remind him that when he himself, as Colonial Secretary, recommended the withdrawal of the troops, he did not consider it as an abandonment of the Colonies, though now when Her Majesty's Government recommend the same course, he holds that it means the reverse. I only ask that the same measure should be applied to us as to him. My noble Friend insisted in the strongest terms on the withdrawal of the troops from New Zealand.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I consented that they should remain on certain conditions.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not wish to raise a New Zealand debate. No doubt that was so; but my noble Friend consented that they should remain on certain conditions, which not being complied with, he said that it would then be necessary to pursue that policy of withdrawing the troops which he now declares to be so fatal to the best interests of the Empire. So with regard to the Cape Colony. My noble Friend said the number of troops must be gradually reduced to a certain point, and that if the Colony, which was in considerable commercial difficulties, would not consent to pay for the remaining regiments they must all be withdrawn. Now, I must ask whether that line of argument and action is consistent with the present argument for the preservation of the Empire, regardless of the interests of this country? I am far from saying that the principles which he laid down at the close of his speech should be disregarded. My noble Friend says that considerable soreness and dissatisfaction exists in Canada on this subject, because the Dominion is exposed to Fenian attacks. I was curious to see how this dissatisfaction was connected with Her Majesty's Government. My noble Friend did not connect it; but it is only natural that the Canadians should feel dissatisfaction and soreness at these unprovoked incursions—a feeling, indeed, which is shared by Her Majesty's Government and by this country. My noble Friend then next referred to the apprehensions which existed that the Government were about to abandon that great Colony, and to sever her connection with the mother country. Now, I am very well aware that I cannot hope to persuade my noble Friend to the contrary, because all the repeated declarations which have been made that the Government have no such intention have failed to satisfy him. I really am not aware that any English statesman has ever entertained such an intention, and it would exceedingly surprise me if any ever should, or should pretend that we could absolve ourselves of our obligation to defend Canada in case she should be in danger of a foreign war. That obligation rests upon us in connection with the whole Empire, and I am quite certain that it would be discharged by whatever Government might hold Office. In the minor arrangements, however, which we might think it our duty to make in time of peace, we must be allowed a certain discretion, and it has been thought by military authorities here that a greater concentration of troops would be advantageous not to this country alone, but to the defence of the whole Empire; and I have yet to hear that when the defence of a great Empire has to be undertaken, a concentration of troops can be called a measure of abandonment. In the other measures which we have taken nothing has indicated a want of respect to that great Colony or a disregard for its interests. I will not repeat the recent statements of my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook), as to the supply of arms and guns without cost, but I may mention that, in the faithful discharge of our obligations, we are about to guarantee a loan to Canada for the purpose of certain fortifications which she proposes to erect, for which purpose a Bill has been introduced into the other House. We have undertaken a guarantee in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, and according to the best information it will be finished in two years, which is very satisfactory. In the matter of the fisheries, in which both we and Canada are deeply interested, my noble Friend seems to think that no British ships are stationed there.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I stated that a considerable portion of the ships had been withdrawn, and that the prevalent belief was that they would all be withdrawn.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My noble Friend appears to share many prevalent beliefs which are unfounded. As a matter of fact, I may say that we are in constant correspondence with the Admiral on that station, and that such a force will be maintained as, in conjunction with the Canadian force, may be necessary. That question undoubtedly is one of great importance, as well as of considerable difficulty; but I hope the House will accept the assurance that we are disposed to take care that the fisheries are properly protected. Nor is it true, as a matter of fact, that Canada has altogether been denuded of troops. My noble Friend (Lord Northbrook) only a few nights ago gave a full and frank explanation of the course the Government intend to pursue. Two battalions are now there, and it is the intention of the Government not to withdraw the whole of the troops from Quebec until next year. But the Government is most anxious that it should always be borne in mind that whatever aid may be given to Canada by the mother country in the event of a serious conflict, the defence of the Colony must to a very large extent be left in her own hands and to her own exertions, and there is nothing in that point of view more admirable or satisfactory than the evoking of the military spirit of the Canadians. Nothing will increase the security of Canada so much as the growth of a military spirit and the efforts made by Canada to place her people in such a position that, if the time comes when we shall have to take part in its defence, there may be such a powerful force and such a military spirit as may enable us to undertake it with some prospect of success. The Government have at least a right to say that their policy has not diminished the spirit of the Canadians, for that spirit was never higher than it is at present. While deeming it unnecessary that the House should pass a special Resolution in reference to this miserable raid, I think the matter is of very great importance as an augury of the spirit with which the Canadians would loyally and enetically repel any attack on their frontier, and of the support which the whole Empire might expect to receive from them in any emergency.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I hope I may be permitted to say a few words on this occasion. I do not intend to make any observations on the political or military question, but simply to express my sense of the loyalty and devotion with which the Canadians, as a people, have behaved on this as on every other occasion. Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to keeping a garrison at Quebec, there cannot be among Englishmen any two opinions on this point—that the Canadians have taken a pride in showing their loyalty, their attachment to the Throne, their affection for the old country, and their strong desire that the bonds which have so long united them to us may be strengthened rather than severed. The Fenian raid—this “miserable raid,” as my noble Friend has well termed it—has been the happy means of bringing out the military character of the Canadians greatly to their credit. The more that spirit of self-reliance which they have so eminently displayed is evoked—and not only among the Canadians, but among all other classes in all parts of Her Majesty’s dominions—the better it will be for the Empire at large, and the more it will be to the advantage and benefit of the Colony itself. That spirit of self-reliance and those loyal principles ought to be, and I am sure will be, encouraged by this House and by the country. I have great satisfaction in being able to express my appreciation of the loyalty displayed by the Canadians on this occasion, and my high sense of the Militia and Volunteers—not those of Canada only, but of this country also, who I am sure would distinguish themselves by equal zeal and gallantry, should any call unfortunately be made upon them as has been made on the Militia and Volunteer Forces of Canada. Without the slightest desire to express an opinion on a political or military question—for it will be my duty to carry out the instructions of Her Majesty’s Government, whatever they may be—I hope to be permitted to say the Volunteers, the Militia, and the regular troops must have been gratified at having been associated on this occasion. I am sure the loyalty and good feeling which were exhibited by the Volunteers and the troops on that occasion were such as will always continue to exist among them when placed in a similar position, and the result, I hope, will be to knit more closely still those ties which bind the people of Canada to the mother country, and that friendship which they entertain towards the forces of the Imperial Government.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that if the speech of his noble Friend who brought the question forward (the Earl of Carnarvon) had no other result, his Motion would not have been made in vain if it should have no other consequences than to have brought forth the expression of opinion which had just fallen from the illustrious Duke, whose words he was sure when they were read by the Canadian people would prove to them that their conduct and courage were duly appreciated not only by his Royal Highness, who was conversant with military matters, and who being a near relative of Her Majesty had doubtless in what he said spoken the sentiments entertained by the Sovereign herself, but by the country at large. In reference to the Motion itself, he must say that the opposition offered to it by the Government astonished him greatly—indeed, it seemed to him to convey a compliment to Her Majesty's Ministers. But he was particularly surprised at the reasons which had been advanced by his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies for opposing the Motion. The noble Earl objected to the wording of the Resolution, and argued that it was capable of being so interpreted as to imply a sort of slur on the Canadian Volunteers, and as conveying the idea that their success was due to the fact that some of Her Majesty's regular troops were present. Now, on critically examining the terms of the Motion, he was rather disposed, taking it literally, to put upon it a somewhat opposite interpretation—namely, that Her Majesty's troops would not have succeeded had they not been associated with the Volunteers. That was, however, a very puerile way of regarding the matter. The real question was, was that House or was it not prepared to pay a compliment to the Canadian Volunteers and the regular troops who were united with them for their gallant conduct? If their Lordships were of opinion—as they could hardly fail to be—that such a compliment would be highly appreciated in the Colony, why, he would ask, should they refuse to pay it? It might be true, as had been said, that the attempt made by the Fenians was not a very serious affair; but it might have been so, and the Canadian Volunteers could not possibly have known whether it would have been so or not beforehand—the Canadian Volunteers went to the front prepared to resist any hostile force however strong it might be; and had the invaders been 10 times more numerous they would have encountered the same gallantry. Why, then, for some indirect reasons urged by the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, should the House grudge them a compliment which, by their behaviour, they had merited? His noble Friend had made some remarks about the dissatisfaction which was said to exist in Canada with regard to the withdrawal of the troops, and the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) said he was not aware of any dissatisfaction on that score. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) must suppose that, in the exercise of his official functions, his noble Friend sometimes thought it desirable to read the Canadian newspapers. If so, he could send the noble Earl some documents which would show him that the dissatisfaction prevailing in Canada on the subject was strong and deep. The noble Earl went on to speak of the concentration of troops being a great advantage to the Empire. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) should not certainly, in the presence of the illustrious Duke and other noble Lords experienced in military matters, venture to give an opinion upon the military bearings of the question; but, speaking as a civilian of the policy of concentration, which he supposed meant the concentration of the Imperial troops in England itself for the purpose of maintaining a larger Army at home—he would observe that the "concentration" of force within our own boundaries would not be long without attracting the attention of that party in the House of Commons, of whom it was not unfair to say that they objected to a standing Army altogether, and who would soon proclaim that our military force was unreasonably large and ought to be diminished. It would be well to bear this in mind when the question of "concentration" was under discussion.

LORD LYVEDEN said, that the Resolution, according to the ordinary rules of construction, was only capable of the meaning that their Lordships thought it very lucky that there were Queen's troops present to assist the Canadian Volunteers on the occasion in question—a Resolution which could scarcely be called very complimentary to the Volunteers. He was well aware, he might add, of the courage and energy of our troops; but he would have been pleased if the Canadian forces had been left to cope alone with the incursion of a number of intoxicated Irish emigrants—for to call that miserable raid an invasion would be ludicrous. But he was of opinion that the Resolution was a reprehensible novelty, and while it did not in reality convey a compliment to the Canadian forces, it was of so unusual a character to place on the records of the House that it ought to be withdrawn. The only real compliment was the speech of the illustrious Duke. If it were thought necessary to do anything more, it ought to be done in the usual form of a Vote of Thanks. As to the more general question which had been raised, he could only say that he did not believe any statesman worthy of the name had any idea of abandoning Canada. There was no pretext for the imputation merely because on such a point of detail as the disposition of our regular forces Her Majesty's Government had come to a decision unpalatable to the Canadians. The noble Earl, even, who brought forward the Motion (the Earl of Carnarvon) did not go the whole length of the views which he had expressed, for if he wished to provide any really effective defence for Canada we must keep up there some 10,000 or 20,000 men; whereas he asked for only one or two regiments, which could be of no great use, except in the way of example and advice in military matters. The maintaining of a large force in Canada was, indeed, now deprecated on all sides, for it was quite clear that if attacked at all she would be attacked simply as forming part of the British Empire. As to the soreness which the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had spoken of as existing in the Colony, he could only say that he had not heard anything of it; while the Government were, he believed, perfectly satisfied that the loyalty of the Canadian people had undergone no diminution because of our recent policy. He thought the speech of the noble Earl was ill-timed and injudicious, because it conveyed the impression that there existed a bad feeling between the Colonies and the mother country; and he trusted that, for the reasons given by his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies, their Lordships would reject the proposal which the noble Earl had made.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I rise principally for the purpose of protesting against the remarks made by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lyveden). He says it may be gathered from my noble Friend's speech that there is a bad feeling between the Colonies and the mother country. Now, I venture to challenge the noble Lord to point to any part of that speech which will bear such an interpretation. I shall not follow the noble Lord into the reasons he adduced to show that it would be more conducive to the safety of Canada and to the protection of her interests if there were no Imperial troops in the Colony; but he also found fault with my noble Friend's Resolution on the ground that it was deficient both in grammar and reason; and he repeated the remark made by the Secretary for the Colonies that the Resolution was a slur upon the Canadian people, as the inference to be drawn from it was that the conduct of the Canadian Volunteer Militia would not have been satisfactory if they had not been allied with the Imperial troops. I venture to think, however, that there is no foundation whatever for such an assertion. The Resolution says—

"That this House has learnt with satisfaction that Her Majesty's regular troops were united with the Canadian volunteer militia in their prompt and vigorous efforts in defence of the Canadian frontier of the Empire from the recent so-called Fenian invasion."

Surely the "prompt and vigorous efforts" did not relate to the Imperial troops alone, but to the combination of forces in the Colony. In fact, there is nothing in the Resolution, from beginning to end, which casts a slur upon the Volunteers. The noble Lord also says that the Resolution is of a novel character, and that your Lordships ought to move a Vote of Thanks if it be necessary to do anything at all. I cannot, however, think that the Resolution is a "reprehensible novelty," as the noble Lord terms it. I think we cannot too highly praise the conduct of the Canadians on the occasion referred to, and I believe they would join our troops in repelling an invasion with the greatest satisfaction and pleasure, because they would feel that, by being associated with the Imperial troops, they were to that extent associated with the mother country, between which and the Colony there always had been, and I hope there always will be, the greatest cordiality of sentiment. Before I sit down, I wish to make a very few remarks on some of the statements made by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies. In the commencement of his speech he told us that he cordially concurred in everything my noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) said respecting the conduct of the Canadians. He said they had done all they were called upon to do; and I expected he would have gone on to say he saw no objection to the opinion stated in the Resolution. Instead of doing so, however, he announced his intention of moving the Previous Question—which means that he declines the responsibility of giving any opinion on the subject. It is impossible that there can be a more illogical conclusion to the remarks with which he started. I was very much struck by the line of argument taken by the noble Earl in order to show that all our troops ought to be withdrawn from Canada. He led us to believe that this was a great military movement, and that by way of assisting the Colonies we were about to concentrate all our forces in this country. But by this minor arrangement you will, in my judgment, so reduce the Army that there will be some difficulty in bringing it back to that condition of efficiency which is so desirable in the present state of public affairs. For these reasons I cordially support the noble Earl's Motion—for I must say that although I listened with great attention to all the remarks which fell from my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, he has altogether failed to convince me that there is any justice or wisdom in moving the Previous Question on the present occasion.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Earl who brought forward this Motion (the Earl of Carnarvon) stated that it was most desirable to have discussions in this House on colonial matters. I cannot say, however, that I quite agree with him on that point. I think discussions on colonial questions are of great importance, and when properly conducted they may be of great use; still, I certainly do think it is not desirable that a noble Earl speaking with great authority in this House, having formerly been Secretary for the Colonies, should come forward day after day and charge the Government—or rather insinuate that the Government—have other objects than those which they declare they have. I do not care for this as far as your Lordships are concerned; but in the Colonies it has great influence, and is a chief means of producing what the noble Earl calls soreness on the part of the Canadians. As a marked accusation has been brought against me, and as it is entirely unfounded, I will repeat what I said at an early period of this year, when this question was very fully discussed. First of all I made a declaration that if any one of our Colonies were attacked by a foreign enemy the whole force of the Empire would be exerted for its protection; but I added that against Fenian raids and filibustering expeditions a Colony like Canada could defend itself. My noble Friend argues, however, that when our troops are withdrawn from the Colony the Fenians will take courage and attack the Canadians. Why, instead of that being the case, they selected a time before the troops began to move in order to make that attack, which was so miserably attempted and so admirably repelled. I have twice this Session explained the general principle of concentrating troops not in this country exclusively, but also in certain Imperial stations and fortresses where they may be of great use. Into that question, therefore, I will not enter at the present time. And as to the Motion under discussion, I do trust it will be generally admitted that my noble Friend was right in moving the Previous Question. Some objection may certainly be raised against the grammar of the Motion; for while two noble Earls think it conveys an opinion that the Colonial troops could not have succeeded without the aid of the Imperial troops, the noble Lord on the other side took an opposite view, and said he thought it meant that the Imperial troops could not have succeeded without the aid of the Colonial troops. Six years ago the noble Earl opposite was reported to have said—

“The feeling of the country has been unmistakably manifested against the Bill”—

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: What Bill?

EARL GRANVILLE: The New Zealand (Guarantee of Loan) Bill introduced in 1846.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I was not in the House at that time.

EARL GRANVILLE: The Bill I see was introduced in 1864, and I was not referring to the noble Earl who just spoke, but to the noble Earl sitting beside him (the Earl of Malmesbury), who said—

“The feeling of the country had been unmistakably manifested against the principle of the

The Duke of Richmond

Bill, and there was now firmly established in the public mind a complete conviction that a Colony when once it had arrived at a certain point of power and prosperity ought to defend itself against its natural enemies, and ought not to call on the mother country for the aid of Imperial troops."—[3 Hansard, clxxvi. 1989.]

So it must be in a non-natural sense that the noble Earl introduced this Resolution. But the objection raised to it by my noble Friend is a very just one—that the occasion was not sufficiently important for a formal Motion in this House. And I cannot help thinking that one point has entirely escaped the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond). On a recent occasion Lord Ellenborough moved an Address that the Abyssinian Army should be received with honour on their return to this country; and on that occasion, if I am not mistaken, the noble Earl pointed out, in the strongest manner, that honours of this sort ought not to be bestowed upon the Motion of an individual Member of this House, however distinguished he might be, but that it was a great constitutional principle that honours of this sort should come spontaneously from the Crown; and this principle is so sound that I feel sure that it cannot have been taken into consideration by some of the noble Lords opposite, or they would not have supported the Motion of the noble Earl.

LORD CAIRNS: The answer to the last remark which has fallen from the noble Earl (Earl Granville) is this—It is for the Crown alone to offer rewards to those who distinguish themselves in fighting the battles of the country; but the proposal that Lord Ellenborough made was not that this House express any opinion upon the conduct of the troops, but that they should be received with honours upon their arrival. In reply to that it was said that the bestowal of honours upon the troops should come from the Crown through its responsible Ministers. But it is not proposed that any honours, rewards, or particular marks of distinction should be bestowed upon the troops which have been serving in Canada—it is simply an expression of opinion on the part of Parliament—and I have yet to learn that the voice of Parliament is prevented in any way from expressing an opinion upon the manner in which the local or Imperial troops have behaved on any particular occasion. The noble Earl has referred to a passage in which my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Malmesbury) said some time ago that he thought when the Colonies arrived at a particular point of prosperity, it ought to be inculcated as a principle that they should be charged with their own defence against their natural enemies.

EARL GRANVILLE: Permit me to continue the quotation. The noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) added—

"With respect to Canada, we could not too soon persuade the people of that country that it was impossible for them to obtain Imperial assistance in the way of English troops."—[Ibid.]

LORD CAIRNS: That does not set aside the remark I was about to make. Whatever may be the duty of Canada with regard to those who may be termed her natural enemies—if she has any—what we ought to remember is that these Fenian raids into Canada were made not because the Fenians are the enemies of Canada, but because they hoped, through Canada, to strike a blow at the mother country, and cause her, if possible, humiliation and distress. We should remember that although Canada appeared to be fighting her own battle, she was really fighting ours, and therefore we should look upon these efforts which Canada has so successfully made as having been made really in defence of the mother country.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I confess that when I saw this Motion first, I did not for a moment expect the noble Earl intended to divide upon it. I interpreted it as a desire on his part to evoke a personal expression of opinion upon the part of your Lordships, and that object having been attained I supposed he would withdraw it. I certainly never thought he intended to commit the House of Lords to an untenable position. Look at the Motion. It is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl. It is perfectly legitimate for noble Lords opposite to condemn the policy of the Government with regard to the diminution of the number of troops in Canada; but if that be their opinion let them express it openly in a manly and straightforward way, not covertly insinuate it. Let it be distinctly stated that the policy of the noble Lords on the Front Benches opposite is in favour of a large Imperial Army in Canada, then Her Majesty's Government will know how to meet them. The Motion cannot be said to be a Vote of Thanks to the Canadian Volunteers; and it is certainly not a Vote of Thanks to the Queen's troops, for it seemed to hint that the Canadian Volunteers did all the fighting, and that the Queen's troops did nothing at all. The Motion, indeed, is capable of several different interpretations, and yet it does not express the policy which my noble Friend advocates. I therefore trust he will not endeavour to place the House in so foolish a position as to divide upon it.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE: I rise only for a moment to support the proposal just made that the noble Earl should withdraw his Motion. The noble Earl has gone into the whole question as to whether we are to keep any considerable number of troops in Canada; he has discussed the propriety of our continuing to defend our Colonies and the expediency of releasing ourselves from that obligation. The noble Lord has indeed succeeded in raising an ample discussion upon these important topics, and he has also drawn from all sides of the House a very decided expression of opinion as to the manner in which the Canadians defended—and it is certain that they did most bravely defend—their frontier; but as considerable doubt has been expressed on both sides of the House with respect to the meaning of the Resolution, it would be a mistake, I think, to carry it to a Division. I trust, therefore, that my noble Friend will withdraw his Motion, and be content with having obtained an expression of the feeling entertained by your Lordships upon the subject.

LORD LYTTTELTON avowed that his original intention was to vote in favour of the Motion. He saw in it no insinuation nor any grammatical defect. It indicated the wholesome policy that the mother country should continue in close relationship with the Colonies, to which he could never refuse his assent.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am afraid that the criticism to which this Motion has given rise will entirely destroy the gracious act it was intended to represent. If the Government press their opposition to a Division, it is probable they will find themselves in a minority; but the compliment it was intended to convey to the Canadian Volunteers and regular troops by the Resolution would cease, under the circumstances, to be a compliment. The Members of Her Majesty's Government have carped at and criticized the terms of the Motion, they have put upon it all manner of unnatural and impossible constructions, and with so much pertinacity that I am afraid, if we did record this Resolution on the Journals of the House, it would not have the effect we intended. Under these circumstances, although it is with regret, I counsel the noble Earl to withdraw his Motion. In their agony to avoid this Resolution the Government has been induced to give far more distinct pledges than they have ever given before as to the duty and necessity of defending Canada to the utmost of their power when attacked by a foreign foe. It was especially necessary that such an expression of opinion on the part of both sides of the House should be given, because this is a case in which the whole danger Canada incurred was incurred on account of the mother country.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I will not, after this evening's debate, make more than one or two observations; but, in self defence, I am bound to say that when the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) drew an analogy between the policy I pursued and that pursued by the Government in the present instance he argued upon a false assumption. There is no ground for drawing such an analogy, the conditions in every case in which I acted having been entirely different from those of the present instance; and the act itself, both in its practical consequences and in its general policy, being essentially different. In the next place, I rejoice—and I am certain your Lordships will rejoice—at hearing the speech of the illustrious Duke on the Cross Benches (the Duke of Cambridge), which I am satisfied will produce an excellent effect. Lastly, I am glad to hear the despatch read by the noble Lord the Secretary of the Colonies, and I can only wish that it bore an earlier date. But as far as the Motion itself is concerned, I feel that the purpose which I had in raising this discussion has been answered in a great measure, and that by pressing it further there would be a risk of undoing that which has been accomplished. Therefore, although I think that Her Majesty's Government have undertaken a certain responsibility, and have placed themselves in an unfavourable position by rejecting my proposal on the grounds they have chosen, I shall feel it my duty to withdraw the Motion.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

NEUTRALITY LAWS.—HORSES CONTRABAND OF WAR.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government are aware that large purchases of horses are being made in Ireland by one at least of the Continental Governments now at war; and how far horses are or may properly be considered contraband of war? He regretted that the House should be so thin at that moment, because he thought his Question related to a matter which was at present a matter of the highest importance, and one to which, apparently, Her Majesty's Government had not given sufficient consideration. His Question assumed a fact of which he believed there was abundant evidence—namely, that agents of one, if not of both, the belligerent Powers were in this country, and more especially in Ireland, buying horses in large numbers. If this were so, it started at once two considerations of great gravity—namely, how far such proceedings affected our relations with those Powers and our neutrality towards each of them, and how far they affected our interests at home. He should be sorry to see a check given to a trade which he should be glad to see more prosperous in Ireland—the trade of breeding and selling horses. He was one of those who thought that some blame attached to the Imperial Government for not having extended more encouragement to that trade; but if agents of both or one of the belligerents were at present purchasing horses in the United Kingdom we had to consider how far it was consistent with our neutrality to permit such proceedings. We might either directly prohibit such aid being afforded to either of the belligerents, or we might allow it to be afforded to both, impartially, opening our ports equally to all comers; at the same time, it was impossible not to see that if such a trade in horses were carried on it must tend very much to the advantage of one of the belligerents and very little to the advantage of the other. It was not, however, our fault if the geographical position of France or the superiority of her navy gave her the advantage in that respect; and if this trade was permitted to go on it must be of immense use to France, should she be engaged in a protracted war, to have the United Kingdom to draw upon as a source of supply for remounting her cavalry. Yet the other belligerent Power would have no right to complain against us on that account, because, as far as we were concerned, she might come to our market as freely as her antagonist. Now he was quite certain that his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would confirm his assertion that in permitting this trade we wished to lean to the side of neither party. He perceived that a Question had been put in the other House as to how far horses were contraband of war or not; and the Government had, very properly as he thought, refused to give any definition of what articles were or were not contraband of war. But let their Lordships consider this case. If after war was declared and had commenced—as he was afraid was the fact at the present moment—a British ship was overhauled in the Sound or the Baltic by a French man-of-war and found to be conveying a cargo of horses for Prussia—would not that cargo be seized as contraband of war, taken to a French Prize Court, and condemned? In Wharton's Law Lexicon, edition 1867, under the title "Contraband," was the following passage at page 233:—

"It is admitted on all hands, even by Mr. Hubner, the great advocate for the freedom of neutral commerce, that everything that may be made directly available for hostile purposes is contraband, as arms, ammunition, horses, timber for shipbuilding, and all sorts of naval stores. In the term contraband, horses and saddles may be included."

Hautefeuille's Droits et Devoirs des Nations Neutres, vol. ii, p. 337; Marten's Précis, vol. ii, p. 316. Again, in the last edition of M'Culloch's Dictionary of Commerce, title "Neutrality," p. 219, the same passage from Hubner's work, De la Saisi des Batimens Neutres, vol. i., p. 193, was quoted. Ortolan and Hautefeuille seemed to think that coal never could be considered contraband of war. He apprehended, therefore, that horses exported for the purposes of either of the Governments now unfortunately belligerent could fairly be condemned as contraband of war. Now, the Prime Minister the other day said that the Government did not lay down, in the Proclamation of Neutrality, what merchandize was and what was not contraband of war; and, in doing so, he said he was only following the precedent set by Lord Malmesbury, quoting a letter, written in 1859, by direction of Lord Malmesbury when Foreign Secretary, in reply to an application from a private firm with respect to coal. In that letter Lord Malmesbury said that Her Majesty's Proclamation did not specify, and could not properly specify, what articles were or were not contraband of war, and that—

"The Prize Court of the captor is the competent tribunal to decide whether coal is or is not contraband of war, and that it is obviously impossible for the Government of Her Majesty, as a neutral Sovereign, to anticipate the result of such decision. It appears, however, to Her Majesty's Government that, having regard to the present state of naval armaments, coal may in many cases be rightly held to be contraband of war."

This no doubt was perfectly sound; but what would be the effect if this trade in horses from the United Kingdom should continue, and a cargo should be condemned? It might place us in a very unpleasant position. He would not inquire into the condition of our own cavalry; but it was evident that when a great war raged on the Continent of Europe our interests were so complicated and extended over so wide a range that there must always be more or less possibility that this country would be drawn into the contest, however anxious we might be—as, he believed, was the case at present—to remain neutral and impartial. That possibility was liable to become a probability, especially when we had engagements and entanglements with respect to the Continent; and it was, therefore, most important to determine how far we ought to allow the exportation of so valuable and necessary a material of war as horses to proceed unchecked. He hoped this question would be well considered by the Government before any definitive step was taken; and it was better that it should be considered at once, while our neutrality remained unimpeached.

EARL GRANVILLE: With regard to the first part of my noble Friend's Question, I have no authentic information; but I have been told that both in Ireland and in this country purchases of horses have been made, and that at this time of the year there is almost invariably a very large exportation of horses from this country to the Continent. I am further told that this exportation has been considerably increased this year—that foreign agents have been buying young horses at fairs, and that a considerable number of what are vulgarly called "screws" have been bought at £20 a piece. As to the second part of the Question—namely, how far horses may be regarded as contraband of war, my noble Friend himself admits that the head of the Government was quite right in not answering that question—and I have heard it remarked that no question is indiscreet, but only the answer is so. I think, however, that the noble Marquess answered his own Question most admirably by quoting certain learned authorities, from which there is no doubt whatever that as to horses, coal, timber, sails, ropes, and various other articles, it depends entirely on the destination, and a thousand circumstances which cannot be defined beforehand, whether they are to be held as contraband of war—a matter which can only be properly decided in the Prize Court of the captors. It is perfectly impossible for Her Majesty's Government to lay down any definition on this point, and, certainly, it is not in the least degree necessary that they should do so; because, following the usual practice when our own interests are not concerned and we are not in immediate expectation of being engaged in war, we do not prohibit the exportation of such merchandize. The noble Marquess says that this export trade in horses if permitted to go on may embroil us with one or other of the belligerents, or otherwise prove injurious. As to its embroiling us with belligerents, I cannot conceive of its doing so as long as it is equally permitted to both parties. The noble Marquess observes that this trade in horses, if permitted, may be of very great advantage to one of the belligerents and of very little to the other. But if we were to consider such questions as whether France is more in want of horses than Prussia, or Prussia is more in want of coal or corn and other things than France, and if we were to try and make distinctions on that account, I fear we should find ourselves landed in endless difficulties. With regard to the injury to ourselves, I think, as far as it goes, and very much further, it is an unmixed benefit not to stop that exportation of horses which goes on at all times, and allows the breeders of horses to get.

the price which an increased demand may give. As to the exportation that is now being made being likely to lead to such a want of animals that in case of war—which Heaven forbid!—we should be unable to mount our own cavalry, the idea is almost preposterous. I believe I have answered the Question of the noble Marquess, which has not only been discussed now, but was very much considered when we were at war ourselves; and the general conclusion then was that, excepting for a few weeks' advantages, it was doubtful whether we did not do ourselves great damage by prohibiting the exportation of contraband of war, and while, except in making a delay of a few weeks, it is almost impossible to damage the enemy.

AN INCORRIGIBLE ROGUE.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a report in the newspapers of a case tried before the Magistrates at Kirton Lindsey Quarter Sessions, where one Joseph Townsend was charged with being "an incorrigible rogue," and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment and to receive thirty-six lashes with the cat; and, if he will state what specific offence was proved against this man, and whether, in his opinion, the Magistrates did or did not exceed their powers?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that the facts of this case were these—Joseph Townsend was 44 years of age, and on the 1st of July he appeared before the quarter sessions at Kirton Lindsey, and received, under 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, the sentence stated by the hon. Member. He had been supplied with a list of the offences of this man as follows:—18th March, 1865, convicted as an incorrigible vagabond, and sentenced to one month's imprisonment; in July of the same year convicted of vagrancy, and sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment; in March, 1868, again convicted and sentenced to 21 days' imprisonment; in June, 1868, again convicted, and received one month; in 1869 again convicted, and sentenced to 21 days; in November, 1869, again convicted, and received one month; again in December of that year, and received 21 days; again on the 8th January, 1870, and received three months; and, lastly, the conviction in July, and the sentence of three months' imprisonment and 24 (not 36) lashes from the cat of nine-tails. The sentence was inflicted under 5 Geo. IV., s. 10, and under the circumstances he thought that the specific offences had been proved, and that the magistrates had not exceeded the powers conferred upon them by the law.

LICENCES FOR CARRIAGES LENT.

QUESTION.

MR. SALT said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is necessary, under the present law, that a coachmaker, who lends (as a matter of courtesy, not of profit), a carriage to a customer for a few days, during the repairs of another carriage (upon which duty has been paid), should take out a fresh licence for the carriage so lent?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The rule is that a licence must be taken out for every carriage used by the person who makes use of it. The coachmaker keeps it and uses it by lending it to another person, and therefore he must take out a licence for it.

ARMY—VOLUNTEER CAPITATION GRANT.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, What resolution Her Majesty's Government have come to with respect to the Capitation Grant to the Volunteers for the current year; whether the present distinction as to efficient and extra efficient is to be preserved; and, whether the promised bonus of an additional grant of 10s. per man will be allowed or not, and to which of the two classes it is to be paid? He acknowledged that the matter had been to some extent explained since he put the Question on the Notice Paper.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN, in reply, said, the old distinction between efficient and extra efficient was to be preserved: the grant to efficient would be 20s., and that to extra efficient 30s.; and there would be an additional grant, not of 10s., but of 5s., which would be given under regulations that would be framed after consultation with commanding officers, but which would not affect the Estimates for the present year.

ARMY—ARTILLERY AND ENGINEERS. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN ESMONDE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether any decision has been arrived at as to the retirement of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers?

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, in reply, that the Report upon the matter was in a very advanced state, and it would be submitted to the Secretary of State for the War Department in the course of the ensuing week.

NAVY—DEPTFORD DOCKYARD. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT MAHON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the money for the purchase of Deptford Dockyard has been paid in full?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, in reply to the noble Lord, I beg to say that the purchase-money for the first portion of Deptford Dockyard sold, all of which belonged to the Admiralty, and which was bought by Mr. Evelyn, amounting to upwards of £31,000, has been paid.

As to the remainder of the Yard, in which the Office of Woods, on behalf of Her Majesty, has the greater interest, the title thereto has not been completed, and the purchase-money has consequently not been paid. It, however, is quite ready, and the purchaser is pressing the Government for the completion of the matter, which I hope will not be much longer delayed. We are merely waiting for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the questions of title between the Office of Woods and the Admiralty.

COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.—QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether any Memorials in favour of the abolition of compulsory Pilotage have been received at the Board during the five years previous to 1870; and, if so, the number?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he could only repeat the answer he had already given in his evidence before the Select Committee on this question, which was that all the memorials received by the Board of Trade had been referred to the Committee, and were, for the most part, given in the Appendix to its Report.

MR. C. TURNER said, that no memorials were presented to the Committee. He thought they had a right to a distinct answer to the Question whether any memorials had been received or not.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, his reason for not having answered the Question more distinctly was that a specific answer to the Question in the form in which it was put would be misleading as to the interest taken by the public in this question.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Are there any, or are there not?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: To that question I must repeat that there are none beyond those referred to in the Appendix of the Report.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

[BILL 218.]

(Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. DIXON said, that he had never offered any factious opposition to the measure, or delayed its progress, nor should he now oppose the third reading; but it must not, therefore, be concluded that he was satisfied with it as it now stood. On the contrary, it was his intention, as soon as the Bill became law, to give Notice that early next Session he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Elementary Education Act of 1870. The objectionable portion of the Bill, which he had pointed out when it was first introduced, had either not been removed at all, or at the best had been very imperfectly remedied. The establishment of school Boards, wherever they were necessary for the purpose of securing to every child in the kingdom the elements of education, was the leading object of the Bill; but he feared that the Bill in its present form would not realize the good intentions of the Government in this respect, and that school Boards would not be found in many districts that stood greatly in need of them. This, especially, would be the case in the rural districts: where school Boards were established they would have to confront the religious question; and he feared that discussion and dissensions would follow which would be inimical to the efficient working of the Act. He regretted that universal compulsion had not been enforced by the Bill, for in many parts of the country—and, again, especially in the agricultural districts—the objections to the compulsory principle were strong, and it would be found that children would still grow up uneducated, owing to the apathy, the indifference, or the selfishness of their parents. He also regretted that more ample provision had not been made for that class of persons who would be unable to send their children to school, on account of their inability to pay the school fees. He was not so unreasonable, however, as to expect that the Government measure should in all respects have harmonized with his views; he was prepared for shortcomings. But there was one clause introduced by the Government, which was of a totally different character to the others—the clause which provided for an increase in the grants to voluntary schools. He believed that this was a retrograde movement—it was one to which the Nonconformists had strong objections—it continued, and might possibly render permanent a system which they had over and over again expressed their objections to, and it was one which he believed would be condemned by Liberals in all parts of the country. He admired, in common with the whole House, the admirable temper and the great ability with which the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had carried this Bill through the House, but he would remind the Government that, notwithstanding the merits of the right hon. Gentleman, the Bill owed its great success in the House mainly to two causes, which would not be forgotten in the country. The first was the almost constant and earnest support which was given to it by the Opposition; and the other was the statement made over and over again by the Government— a statement amounting almost to a threat—that unless their usual supporters went into the same Lobby with them on this Bill, they would run the risk of losing the Bill, and incur the condemnation of the country. He regretted that the success of the Bill had been purchased at such a heavy price, for he could not hide from himself that it had roused the suspicion, the distrust, and the antagonism of some of the most earnest supporters of the Government. He thought it was a great disadvantage, if not a positive evil, that those who had done so much to place the Government in the position which they now occupied should be accustomed to an attitude of opposition, and to make appeals which would be repeated to the great Liberal party outside the House against the action of a Government which had hitherto received from them the most unvarying, loyal, and enthusiastic support.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dixon) had charged the Government with having acted inconsistently with their Liberal principles, in the manner in which they had framed and conducted this Bill. After the solemn warning which the hon. Member had given, that he and his Friends meant to fight the battle over again next Session, he (Mr. Cowper-Temple) would take the liberty of saying that, so far as he understood the question, the failure of the hon. Member and his Friends had not arisen from any inconsistency with Liberal principles on the part of the Government or of those who supported the Government, but from the very inconsistent and contradictory position which the hon. Member and his Friends had taken up upon this question. They professed to speak the sentiments of the Nonconformists. Now, the Nonconformists took their stand and had always done so on freedom of opinion on matters of religion—on the principle that the Bible was the great standard of religious truth, and that it ought to be open to everyone in the country to read and to teach it. But the hon. Member and his Friends, professing to act in the name of the Nonconformists, had urged the House that measures should be taken to deprive the teachers in the schools created under the Bill, of the right, which everybody else in this country enjoyed, to explain the Bible according to their own views and opinions. While they spoke in the name of persons who had the greatest reverence for the Bible, they had pressed either that the Bible should be excluded from the schools altogether, or that it should be received with a stigma which was placed on no other book—that of being a dangerous and pernicious book, not to be freely handled and interpreted without risk. ["No, no!"] Well, he would recall those expressions; but he said this—that they wished to surround the Bible with restrictions, and to prevent it from being freely explained by the teacher in accordance with his own views and opinions upon it. He did not think that that was a consistent position to take up, or that it would be agreed to by the large body of persons who maintained, as a principle they had always fought for, a free and open Bible. That was an inconsistency which was sufficient to prevent the hon. Member and his Friends from carrying their point. Again, when they urged that something should be put in the Bill for the purpose of making the teaching unsectarian, they could not agree among themselves as to the words, and they at last put forward words so vague and ambiguous that they were not capable of legal interpretation. In the same way, those Gentlemen who had so pertinaciously opposed the Bill were great advocates of economy, and yet they advocated gratuitous school instruction and the suppression of all the existing schools, which would have thrown a heavy additional burden upon the ratepayers and taxpayers of this country. So, again, those Gentlemen who opposed the Bill were members of the great Liberal party, who professed to be anxious for individual freedom, and yet they were driven, by the necessities of their position, to offer more despotic power to the Government and the local Boards, though the Bill already conferred more despotic powers upon the Education Department than were ever conferred on a Department of the State by an Act of Parliament, in order to enforce opinions and views which they confessed were not in accordance with the wishes and feelings of large districts of the country. Their failure did not arise from a want of willingness on the part of the Government to meet their objections, for he must say he had been struck by the extreme willingness of his right hon. Friend at the head of the Department and his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government to listen candidly and fairly to every objection, and to admit any fair Amendment that was founded upon consistency, and that ran upon all-fours with the scheme of the Bill. He had no fear, therefore, that when Parliament met again, after the Prorogation, it would take a different view of the question from that which it did now. There was one body that deserved more credit in these discussions than it had yet received—he meant the Church of England. The Church of England, as far as she had been spoken for by those who represented her views, had shown no desire to press unduly her own particular views or personal objects, but had shown herself willing and anxious to pass this great measure of education without unnecessary delay. Her representatives had not unduly pressed forward in the House any extreme views; they were willing to sacrifice their own special desires in order to facilitate the passing of this measure. And he would say, as far as he could gather the opinions of the Liberal party throughout the country—though the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) might and did represent a large portion who were urgent, ardent, and anxious to carry out his views—yet, generally, throughout the country this Bill was felt by men of all parties to be a measure wisely framed, and a successful attempt to build a new system upon old foundations. The measure would be more acceptable because it rested on what was already in existence instead of starting afresh upon some particular theory. It seemed to hon. Gentlemen that nothing was so easy as to create schools; whereas those who had examined into the subject knew that nothing was more difficult. They would be acting in a rash and reckless manner if they were to drive from the field of education those who had filled it for so many years, and who had borne the burden by their voluntary labours. He had no doubt that when the measure had been tried in the country for some time it would be found admirably adapted to accomplish its purpose; that under it education in primary schools would be widely extended; and that the large majority of the House who had supported the Bill would receive the approbation of the nation.

MR. MIALL said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) challenged, and he thought not very wisely, those, especially of the Nonconformist Body, who had taken part in opposition to this Bill, for their inconsistency and consequent want of success. They laughed who won. The right hon. Gentleman had had all his desires accomplished, and he might say all the desires of the Church which he represented—[“No, no!”]—perhaps not all, but at least all the desires that it was thought could be conveniently put forward by the Church; and he did not, therefore, wonder that the right hon. Gentleman took up rather a jubilant tone on this occasion, and turning round to those who had to pass through the Valley of Humiliation gave them the most discreet advice with regard to the future, and told them that all their misfortunes had proceeded from want of consideration and union as respected the past. Now, it used to be said that those were fortunate people who had friends at Court. He did not know whether Court in that sense could be interpreted as Government; but he did not think it could be said that those were fortunate people who had been allied to the Government on this occasion. He might say, without boasting, that the present Administration occupied the position it did very mainly in consequence of the warm, hearty, enthusiastic support by the Nonconformist body of the policy announced by the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown two years ago at the last General Election. He did not say that they were the sole agents in putting the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends where they were; but he did say this, that they were the heart, and, he might say, the hands of the Liberal cause in this country. He might say that they imparted to it all the enthusiasm it exhibited—that they gave whatever new impulse was given to the Liberal cause for the present time and for years to come; and that the spirit which was exhibited by the Nonconformist electors of the country at the last General Election was the main force that carried the right hon. Gentleman and his policy triumphantly through the obstacles—and they were not slight obstacles—that were opposed to them by the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite. They did not, when this question was first brought forward, expect anything that was immoderate or demand anything that he thought was selfish. They knew that this was a question which touched very closely many of their principles; and they did think, perhaps somewhat presumptuously, looking back on the past, that they were entitled to be consulted, in some respects, as to the general principles and drift of legislation which grated harshly on their sympathies. They did think that some consideration would have been paid to their objections; and, certainly, they had no expectation, when their objections had been urged, that remedies would have been applied that rather increased and aggravated those objections than otherwise. But they were very unfortunate. It seemed they were inconsistent too. He admitted to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper-Temple) that they had been divided and they had been beaten. That was the moral they had to learn from the lesson of this Session. There had been a separation he would not say in feeling, but of thought and sympathy with regard to this Bill among the Dissenting bodies, especially as represented in that House—far more separation in the House than out of it; for he could aver, of his own personal knowledge that there was scarcely a Dissenting organization in the country that had not pronounced condemnation of this Bill. He thought they had good reason to complain. Considering that they were at all events a fair moiety of the party now in power—considering that they never made any excessive demands even for their own principles of those who held others, and considering the general temper and feeling of the country in regard to questions like this, he did not think that they had been dealt with considerately, and with a fair view to meet the objections that they had candidly urged against the provisions of this Bill. He would not urge this further than was necessary on the Treasury Bench, but “once bit, twice shy.” They had almost all the measures in which they were most interested cast out with something like contumely—not in this House only, but in the other House during the present Session. Their Burials Bill was referred to a Select Committee, which bestowed the utmost care and consideration on its provisions, in order to divest it of anything that could possibly hurt the feelings of Churchmen. He appealed to the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) whether the general spirit manifested in that Committee was not a spirit of concession on both sides? But the Bill no sooner came down here than a small and compact party determined that it should be “talked” out. It was then they bestowed with the Government great pains upon the University Tests Bill. They sent it up imperfect as it was in character—advisedly imperfect—that it might pass in “another place;” but their Lordships, smitten with excessive caution with regard to religious teaching, had put it in such a position that he believed one Peer had declared within the last 24 hours his opinion that the Bill was done for the present Session. He might mention one or two other measures which were in the same category. He must say, looking to all these things, if they, representing the Dissenting community, could stand by and see themselves elbowed out of their principles and rights they would deserve such treatment. With regard to the Education Bill, he would say that he hoped its working in this country would be better than its effect on parties in that House. It had produced a very painful impression on Dissenters generally, and on the greater number of Dissenting representatives in that House. It might be said, and had been said, that the Bill, after all, was far more liberal than it looked. He believed it would be found probably to work more smoothly than could be anticipated, for it was an educational measure. But they might be pardoned, he thought, as Nonconformists, for having mistaken—if they had mistaken—the real character and position of that measure. It was the first time that a measure brought in and advocated on the express ground that it embodied the principles of political equality had failed to recommend itself to the sympathies of the Dissenting body. What they might say, with even more distinctness, was that it was the very first time that a measure had gone up to “another place” at that late period of the Session, with regard to which they had the assurance that not a single alteration would be made in it of any importance except that which took away the Ballot. It might be a very liberal measure indeed; it might contain in its provisions all that was necessary to illustrate and carry into effect the doctrines of religious equality; all that he could say was that not such honour had all the measures proceeding from the Liberal party.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am very sorry to interfere in the debate at this moment, but I do not think it would be becoming in me, after the speech just delivered by my hon. Friend, if I were to remain altogether silent. My hon. Friend has not been content with discussing the merits of the Bill, but has thought fit to use language concerning the relations between himself and the Government to which it is absolutely necessary I should refer. Speeches somewhat similar we have heard on former nights from my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. H. Richard) and from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Winterbotham); but my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) appears to think that the Government labours under the infirmity of deafness, and that we have failed to receive in our organs of hearing those expressions used by my hon. Friend. The speech of my hon. Friend amounts to a reproach on the Government for not having fulfilled the expectations under which they were brought into power. To this I say, fearlessly, in the face of my hon. Friend and of those who have made use of similar language, that if in 1868 we made bold professions to the country, professions involving, as we well knew then, and as we know now, the greatest responsibility, we have laboured to the utmost of our power to fulfil them, and the whole of our energies and the whole of our influence have, in no spirit of common calculation, been devoted to the purpose of redeeming those pledges. I am not here, therefore, to be told, with nice analysis, of what elements was made up that large degree of national support to which we owe the position we hold. I am not prepared to admit that my hon. Friend, great as is the weight of his character and the respect to which he is justly entitled, speaks in this matter the sentiments of all those with whom he is connected by religious opinions, because there are others in this House who have sat on these Benches for many years, and who have earned the respect of all who know them, who have not participated in the severe judgment passed upon us by my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend thinks it worthy of him to resort to a proverb, and to say that the time has come when he is entitled to use the significant language—"Once bit, twice shy." But if my hon. Friend has been bitten, by whom is it? If he has been bitten, it is only in consequence of expectations which he has himself chosen to entertain, and which were not justified by the facts. We have been thankful to have the independent and honourable support of my hon. Friend, but that support ceases to be of value when accompanied by reproaches such as these. I hope my hon. Friend will not continue that support to the Government one moment longer than he deems it consistent with his sense of duty and right. For God's sake, Sir, let him withdraw it the moment he thinks it better for the cause which he has at heart that he should do so. So long as my hon. Friend thinks fit to give us his support we will co-operate with my hon. Friend for every purpose we have in common; but when we think his opinions and demands exacting, when we think he looks too much to the section of the community he adorns, and too little to the interests of the people at large, we must then recollect that we are the Government of the Queen, and that those who have assumed the high responsibility of administering the affairs of this Empire, must endeavour to forget the parts in the whole, and must, in the great measures they introduce into the House, propose to themselves no meaner or narrower object—no other object than the welfare of the Empire at large. I hope my hon. Friend will excuse me if I have spoken with feeling on this subject. I have, I trust, employed no language disrespectful to him, but I own I could not help feeling wounded at hearing the language he employed coming from a man for whom I entertain the greatest respect, and whom I have always admired as remarkable for combining strong feelings with a candid and considerate manner of giving them expression. And now, Sir, with regard to the Bill itself, I was very sorry to hear the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) issue a proclamation of war against it the moment it is about to pass. We shall be compelled to put our trust in the good sense of the country. I must own I do not think the threatened blast of the trumpet will really rouse the land in opposition to the imperfections which mar such a measure as this. Far be it from me to say that this is a perfect measure. My right hon. Friend near me (Mr. W. E. Forster) to whom I myself especially—to whom the whole Government—to whom the House and the country owe a debt of gratitude, is the last man who would describe this as a perfect measure. We have had to steer our course amid competing bodies and conflicting difficulties. It was with us an absolute necessity—a necessity of honour and a necessity of policy—to respect and to favour the educational establishments and machinery we found existing in the country. It was impossible for us to join in the language or to adopt the tone which was conscientiously and consistently taken by some Members of the House who look upon these voluntary schools, having generally a denominational character, as admirable passing expedients, fit indeed to be tolerated for a time, deserving all credit on account of the motives which led to their foundation, but wholly unsatisfactory as to their main purpose, and, therefore, to be supplanted by something they think better. That is a perfectly fair and intelligible theory for any Gentleman to entertain, but I am quite sure it will be felt that it has never been the theory of the Government. My right hon. Friend and many others who have taken part in this question hold that when we are approaching this great work, which we desire to make complete, we ought to have a sentiment of thankfulness that so much has been done for us. I am one of those who hold that in the production of material objects it is desirable never to multiply the Establishments of the Government beyond what is necessary, but where it is possible to avail ourselves of private energy and zeal. So, in this matter of education, it is a great mistake and error, in our view, to think that secular education given by a State machinery is per se better and more valuable than the same education given by machinery voluntary in its character. Setting aside that which is abstractedly desirable, I think we are justified in feeling that this enormous power which exists in the country ought to be turned to account. It may be viewed, theoretically and abstractedly, in very different lights. Some may think that this existing machinery is no better than a beast of burden; but even as a beast of burden there is no reason why we should not make it do the work of the State as far as it can be rendered serviceable. Some may think it worse than a beast of burden, having its origin from below; but even if its origin were from below, you may use its energies if you can strain them to the public benefit. Some may regard it as an angel from Heaven, as the spirit of Christianity working in the minds of men and producing a profound and deep desire not only to give religious knowledge, but every element of education of essential value. I own I think that is the truest light in which to view it. I think it is the greatest mistake to suppose that those who have founded these voluntary schools have been exclusively or narrowly actuated by a spirit of attachment to those points on which they differ from their fellow-Christians. I believe that having received Christian conviction in its largeness and fulness, a largeness and fulness with which I hope this House will never attempt to interfere, they have thereby been animated with a spirit of expansive benevolence which has not stopped short of the principle to which it owed its origin, but has spread itself into a general feeling of philanthropy. And as Christianity, since it came into the world, has given a new character to secular philanthropy, so religious zeal has created, in this country especially, an amount of anxiety never before exhibited for the promotion of a sound secular education. Then, with regard to the other great question, my hon. Friend is very much dissatisfied with the plan we have adopted by which catechisms are excluded from the schools, and by which the Scriptures are only to be used as a religious text-book, without any Parliamentary declaration or statutory limitations as to their exposition. I will not say a word as to that plan, but I really cannot see how my hon. Friend can for a moment conceive that we who have adopted and recommended it are liable to the reproach of having thereby done less than justice to the Nonconformists of this country, or of having, as my hon. Friend put it, marched them through the Valley of Humiliation. If that charge had proceeded from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), who has a kind of official representation of a large portion of the Church, or from Gentlemen accustomed to treat public questions from a point of view at all peculiar to the Church of England—if, for instance, the hon. Member for North Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote) had complained of having to march through the Valley of Humiliation—the Government, though not in the slightest degree prepared to admit the truth or the justice of that charge, would have received it with less surprise, because, whatever the opinions of my hon. Friend may be, he cannot deny that we have excluded something from the schools, and that what has been so excluded is something particularly characteristic of the Church of England, and objected to by Dissenters. For myself, I believe that it will answer every useful purpose that there should be a free exposition of the Scriptures open to every schoolmaster who may be conscientiously attached to the Nonconformist community, subject, of course, as I hope he will be, to the restraints of common sense, but to no other restraints of a legal kind. Under these circumstances I do hope and very confidently believe that a more kindly and genial view will be taken of this matter than my hon. Friend has for once in his life been content to take. I must own that, though he seemed to make the Government responsible for the failure of the

Burials Bill and the anticipated failure of the University Tests Bill, I find that, at least negatively in his speech, he admits that with this we had nothing to do whatever. The only object of that portion of his speech seems to have been to show that my hon. Friend was disappointed, and ought not to have been disappointed. But does he think that the Government ought to have resigned or to have dissolved Parliament?—for I do not know any other point of view from which it is possible to make a charge against them. Sir, we have had great difficulties to contend with, but I do not think we can claim from hon. Gentlemen opposite—we do not claim from my hon. Friend—I do not know that we can claim from any section of the House any other credit than this, which I believe the bulk of the House is disposed to give us, reserving their own judgment of particulars—that we have striven, and, above all, my right hon. Friend near me has striven, to deal for the best with all the circumstances, to smoothe difficulties, to allay passions, to avoid everything that would excite or stimulate, to endeavour to bring men to work together, to eschew all extremes, and not to make our own narrow choice the model of the measure that we were presenting to Parliament, but to admit freely and liberally, as was our duty, into its composition those great influences which we found swaying the community in which we live. That has been the general principle upon which we have acted. We might have taken a more sectional view, but what would have been the result? That this great subject of national education, instead of now being launched with some partial expressions, it is true, of disapproval, yet, upon the whole, with prospects full of hope, would have been launched indeed, but where? Not launched into the country with extended and beneficial operation, but launched into this House amid excitement and angry feelings—set down here on this floor as another standing barrier between those who sit in different portions of the House, full, indeed, of hope and promise, but of what hope and promise? That for years to come it would furnish the materials of bitter controversies in this House, and that when we cast our eyes beyond the walls of Parliament they would fall everywhere upon district after district where we should have to admit with shame the educational destitution of the people. Sir, I admit I have replied with some warmth to the imputations which have touched me nearly from my hon. Friend; but I hope the House will think that in the remarks I have made on the Bill we are now about to read a third time I have endeavoured to make a fair and equitable statement, and I think that any impartial man, whatever may be his judgment on particulars, will acknowledge that the principles upon which we have acted are the true principles upon which this great and difficult question could alone be settled.

MR. WHITWELL said, while they were passing a general measure of education they ought not to forget the claims of the teachers, who had devoted their lives to the work of instruction. He was not in favour of granting them pensions, but he would suggest the propriety of encouraging them to form some prudential plan of mutual assurance, assisted by the Privy Council, with a view to establishing some provision for themselves in old age and in times of adversity.

MR. RAIKES said, he wished to endorse everything that had been said, in the House and out of it, as to the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had carried the Bill through the House. He believed the Bill had passed scarcely so much upon its own merits as because it had been brought in and conducted by the right hon. Gentleman. When the Bill was introduced there was on all sides a great chorus of congratulation; but the measure had passed through three editions. They had had the original Bill, the Easter edition, and the Whitsuntide edition—in point of fact, they had practically had three separate Bills presented to them, each of them having distinctly marked features of its own, which differed from the leading features of the two others. The measure as it now stood represented the compromise which all parties had agreed to make in order to secure a fairly good educational scheme. At the same time, though there had been such large changes in the form of the Bill, there had been few or no concessions made to the party which had given the most consistent and unvarying support to it. Concessions of a most serious character had been made to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple); and he (Mr. Raikes) only hoped that those concessions would not be so unfortunate in their results as he was afraid they would prove to be. He could not help feeling some misgivings on the part of the Church of England. Although the Education League had not carried all their Amendments, they had a good deal with which to console themselves. It was very unfortunate that the Government would not allow the school districts formed under the Bill to be subdivided even at the discretion of the Education Department. The refusal of the Government to accept that proposal had, he believed, taken away the most valuable and beneficial results of the Bill, and would strike a severe blow at the denominational system of this country, for it could not fail in course of time to weed out something like half the denominational schools which at present existed in different parts of the agricultural districts. A parish which was supplied with schools, but not to an extent sufficient to meet its educational requirements, would be called upon to build a school and support it by rates, and it was contrary to human nature to expect that poor parents would support denominational schools while at the same time they were called upon to pay rates for the new schools. Belonging to a family which had taken a great interest in education, he rejoiced that we had made a great step towards securing to the people the greatest blessing they could enjoy. He felt, however, that the House had not taken sufficient care to provide for the people the blessing of definite religious teaching, which the Church of England considered it her first duty and her highest privilege to impart.

Mr. STAPLETON said, he represented a constituency (Berwick-on-Tweed) in which Nonconformity was very powerful, two-thirds at least of the Liberal party there being Nonconformists; and he admitted that, having given an unvarying support to the Government upon this Bill, he had received some complaints from constituents who were favourable to the view of his hon. Friend below the Gangway. Still those gentlemen were moderate and open to argument; they used no threats as to withdrawing their support either from their Member or from the Government, nor did he believe that such a result was likely to follow from the course he had conscientiously pursued. His feeling was that, while perhaps many Liberal Members would have liked a measure more conformable with their views if the subject had presented a tabula rasa, they could not deny that something was due to those who had been the pioneers in this matter, and of whose exertions in the cause of education they had availed themselves. Even now they were calculating on the continuance of these exertions, without which the financial difficulty would be vastly increased; therefore, the Government had done no more than they might reasonably have been expected to do in giving additional grants to denominational schools. He believed, however, that the Bill would result in the establishment of large numbers of secular schools; but he could not share in the apprehension of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), that religion would suffer if, little by little, those schools should supersede all others until they covered the country. Under a system of secular education, properly administered, religion instead of being attacked, would be strengthened. It was a very common idea, and it had been expressed in that House by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. H. Richard), that secular education meant instruction in literature and science, and that religious instruction, on the other hand, meant instruction in religion and morality. And then it was contended that one day in the week was not enough for religious instruction. But instruction in morality was a part of secular education, and it had this advantage, that it was a mode of education in which all were agreed. All persons, whether Christians or Jews, Roman Catholics or Protestants, Unitarians or Trinitarians, were agreed upon the great principles of morality, all of them condemning murder and adultery, and all of them extolling charity and virtue. If the elements of morality were taught in the week, Sunday would suffice for teaching dogmatic religion. He contended that the fact that the children were receiving secular instruction in the national schools would in no degree detract from the beneficial influence which the respective denominational ministers would be able to exercise over them in the Sunday schools. But the Sunday schools would have to be improved to meet the increased intelligence of the pupils. All the new schools ought to be carefully watched, and care should be taken that in every school sound moral instruction was given.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I hope, Sir, the House will allow me, before the close of the last discussion on this great subject, to say a very few words, especially after what has fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) and the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall). I heard the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham with very great regret, and I heard the speech of the hon. Member for Bradford with still greater regret, for the speech was misleading. The tones of anger in that speech, and the reproach which was levelled against the Government, I, an opponent of the Government, must say were in this instance unjust and undeserved, and they justly called down that rebuke which we have heard from the lips of the First Minister of the Crown. But I have no desire on this occasion to refer to what has passed—let bygones be bygones. My feeling and my hope is, that men of all parties may concur in regarding it as the first duty of the country to give this great measure a fair trial. I cannot now help hoping that the hon. Members for Birmingham and Bradford, and other hon. Gentlemen who have consistently and honourably acted with them in the debates on the question, will, now that this Bill has virtually become the law of the land, combine with those who have been friendly to the Bill and endeavour to insure that it shall answer the great purpose for which it is intended. Having said these few words with reference to the speeches which I have heard with so much regret, I turn with pleasure to the subject of the Bill itself, and I cannot do that without offering my sincere congratulations to Her Majesty's Government, and especially to my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster), for having conducted to a successful issue this most difficult measure—a measure which, whatever may be its defects and shortcomings, will, I believe, in a very large degree meet those urgent and pressing educational requirements—from year to year and from day to day becoming more pressing and more urgent—which it was intended to meet. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) has said, and I think with truth, that this Bill is not a perfect measure, and that even the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, who has conducted it through all its stages, will not contest that statement. I am quite of that opinion, and I hope that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway will bear in mind that, if they think they have their cause of complaint, so do we on this side of the House think that we have ours. There is one subject upon which I have more than once expressed a strong opinion, and that opinion is not altered. I think it will grate upon many people's minds that in this Bill there is no mention made of religion except in a restrictive sense. I do think that that is a great blot in the Bill. I agree with what the right hon. Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) has said to-day, and I think that, after all the Liberal concessions which have been made, it is unfortunate that the Holy Scriptures should not be required to be taught in the schools. It is owing, I think, to a little want of courage on the part of the Government that we have not got that enactment, which is desired by a large proportion of the Nonconformists as much as by Churchmen. It is desired not for the sake of this denomination or of that denomination, but for the sake of religion generally. I regret the condition of the Bill in regard to this point, and I also regret very much the course which the Government have taken in most unnecessarily introducing the Ballot into this Bill. If, as I suppose, they took that course to conciliate hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on their own side of the House, I can only say that it seems to have been very unsuccessful. In my opinion it was an unfortunate step. It was offensive to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House who had given the Government their fair and honourable support throughout the measure. I regret that the Government thought it right to adopt that course; but notwithstanding all these defects, and notwithstanding other defects, which might be found in the Bill if it were worth while to pause and point them out—notwithstanding all these defects, I, for one, accept this Bill with cordial and heartfelt thankfulness. I should be ungrateful and inconsistent if I did not accept it with pleasure, for my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, with whom it has been my fortune to confer on many occasions on the subject, knows that the Bill contains almost every one of those provisions for which, humbly but earnestly, I have laboured for the last 15 or 20 years. Those are provisions which, in my opinion, after long thought, are indispensable to anything like a successful measure of national education. I, therefore, say, whatever may be the defects and shortcomings of the Bill—and I do hope that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway will remember that those defects and shortcomings exist in the opinion of both sides of the House—that I accept the measure with thankfulness and with joy. As time passes, in all probability this measure, like all great ones, will need amendment, and correction, and adaptation to altered circumstances; but I believe it will supply a want which has long been a scandal in English legislation; it will tend in a very large degree to promote the welfare of the country; and I cordially agree with the words which have just been spoken by the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown, that the gratitude of the country and of all parties is due to my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council for that happy combination of great ability with fine temper which has enabled my right hon. Friend to bring this measure to a successful conclusion.

Mr. MELLY said, he had looked forward for years, ever since indeed he had taken any part in politics, to the day when a measure for the primary education of the people would be read a third time in that House, but he could not regard this Bill now before them for the last time with any but mixed feelings. He fully concurred with the speech of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington), who throughout these discussions had shown the most conciliatory disposition, and he wished that the same feeling of conciliation and kindly appreciation of motives had been shown by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, whose speech, in reply to the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), he deeply regretted. He fully sympathized with his hon.

Sir John Pakington

Friend, and it could not but be painful to hear the brilliant invective, the matchless eloquence of the Premier more often used, as had been the case throughout this Bill, in answer to the arguments of his Friends and his party, rather than against his opponents. [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite might laugh, as they could not appreciate the affection and trust which they—the Liberals—felt for the Prime Minister, so neither could they measure the pain his speech had caused a portion of his followers. With that passing remark he would say with the right hon. Baronet—"let by-gones be by-gones." He would rather look forward than look backward in regard to this great measure of popular education. He valued the object above the means of attaining; it the education of their children above a "religious difficulty" or party ties. It became the duty of all to accept the Bill, and endeavour to work it with success; especially the duty of those who, living in the great cities, or representing popular constituencies, had necessarily much influence, which, forgetting all the history of the Bill, they were bound to use towards the fulfilment of its object—the education of every child in the land. While he regretted that the clauses of the Bill had in so great a degree been worded to meet the wishes of the opponents, rather than of the friends, of the Government, still he found a bright gleam of hope in those clauses. Hon. Members opposite had continually said that "monstrous and unconstitutional" powers were given to his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster). If the Liberal party had accepted that Bill, it was because they believed this power would be used in conformity with the speeches of his right hon. Friend, who had often told them that they misinterpreted the scope of the measure, that it would carry out their views in bringing education to the door of every house in the country. That House had granted him all the powers he asked; upon him rests therefore the responsibility. As to him all credit for carrying the measure through the House, so to him they looked for its fulfilment as law in the country. They said the object could not be attained by voluntary effort, or by the denominational method; his right hon. Friend said it could; upon him lay the responsibility to make good his words. The Bill might be epitomised in two clauses; one providing that education should be brought home to every child in the country, the other that the requisite powers for that purpose should be placed in the hands of Government. He (Mr. Melly) wished it were in the power of the House of Commons to pass a third clause—that the right hon. Gentleman might for long years be spared to bring the same energy, earnestness, tact, temper, and perseverance with which he had defeated the dearest wishes of his best friends, to bear upon recalcitrant Town Councils, apathetic Vestries, hostile school Boards, and parsimonious ratepayers, in furtherance of the great end of elementary national education.

Mr. HERMON said, he hoped that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) would act more patriotically than to carry out his threat of agitation, which must necessarily interfere with industry. If he did, he hoped he would pass by Lancashire which, by its own example, might be regarded as suggesting such a course, for though there was no part of the country where the disendowment and disestablishment of the Irish Church was more generally and emphatically condemned, yet, when that measure became law, no steps were taken by politicians in that great country which would lead to anything like animosity or contention.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, he must deny the right of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) to speak against the Bill in the name of the Dissenters of England. He did not believe the hon. Member represented one tenth part of them. A few evenings ago when he (Colonel Beresford) had an opportunity of congratulating the First Minister of the Crown on having so well interpreted the feelings of the country, he held in his pocket Petitions in favour of the course the Government had taken on the point in question signed by 23,000 Primitive Methodists. He also had a letter from Mr. Spurgeon, who could gather under his banner more Nonconformists than any man in that House, urging him to support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cowper-Temple).

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I should ill repay the kindness—very great and most undeserved—with which the House has borne with me and treated me throughout the long discussions on this measure, if I delayed the House beyond a few minutes before, Sir, you put the Question for the Third Reading from the Chair. But I think, perhaps, it is due to the House that having had charge of this Bill, I should take leave of it in a few remarks. My hon. Colleague in the representation of Bradford (Mr. Miall) will, I know, not expect me, if he is in this House, to dwell upon his speech. But I think it right to say this—that it has been a great grief to the Government, and a very great grief to myself, to find, in doing what we conceived to be our duty in promoting a great national system of education by which we shall, as we believe bring education home to every child in the country, that we could not do it without differing in opinion from, and even hurting the feelings of, many persons like my hon. Colleague, with whom we have been in the habit of working, and who are anxious for the same objects. I know his sincerity and the high motives on which he acts in regard to anything in which he thinks principle is involved. I only hope he will allow me to have the same jealousy respecting what I may consider right. But however much we may regret this, it was not an obstacle which we thought should stand in the way of a great national measure of education. And I am confident, notwithstanding what he has said to-day, that the time will come when he will do with regard to this measure of education what he has done in the case of other educational measures—that is, as he now would acknowledge with great candour, that he is glad the opposition which he offered in times past to all national aid to education did not succeed, so I believe the time will come when he will likewise rejoice that his opposition to this measure was unattended by success. But, Sir, I chiefly rose to express my thanks to the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) and to hon. Members on both sides of the House, and in every quarter of the House, for the assistance which has been given to us in getting this Bill through its various stages. When I had the honour of bringing it forward, I stated that I was sure it would be regarded in no party spirit. I did not ask this, for I felt it would be an insult to the House to suppose for a moment that it would be so regarded. My expectation on that point has been entirely justified, and the measure has never been treated or discussed on party grounds by hon. Members on either side. There was, indeed, another question which, unfortunately, we felt compelled—or rather I should say, which we felt bound to introduce into it—and I do not think we could complain that some hon. Members opposite should have objected to the introduction of the Ballot. But with regard to the pure education question, all distinctions such as Tory, Whig, and Radical have been entirely lost in the desire to see a great national measure of education passed. I also expected help. I told the House we were well aware that what we proposed was not perfect; that we did not suppose it could be made perfect at once, and that we expected very great improvements would result from suggestions coming from different sides of the House. I acknowledge the help we have received from all quarters. And now I must state, although I agree with my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) and the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) that a constructive and complicated measure of this kind cannot be made perfect at once—that I cannot assent to a proposition laid down by my hon. Colleague (Mr. Miall) some weeks ago that no measure ought to be passed which would not do for, at least, 20 years. I am, I confess, much more modest in my desires, and am content that we should commence to perform a great national duty, and even though we should have to mend or modify the mode by which this is done within two or three years, I think our time and labour will not have been lost. I think the long and anxious consideration which has been given to the Bill, and the wearying efforts which have been made have not been fruitless. The principle of the Bill has been adhered to, and I think the mode in which it has been decided to carry out that principle is not unworthy of it. The principle was this—a legal enactment that there shall be efficient schools throughout the kingdom, and compulsory provision for the schools where needed, but not unless such need were proved. It was in those words that I described the Bill when I introduced it, and when we send the Bill up to the other House, this principle will still be in it; and I have a sanguine hope that in that Assembly it will receive as patient a consideration as it has received here, and that, with this principle still intact, it will become law. During the passage of the Bill through Committee the machinery was altered, and I think mainly for the better; nor do I know of any change in this respect which I regret. On the contrary, I believe we have simplified the machinery and secured that it shall more freely work, and I am bound to say that for this we have to thank the useful and enlightened suggestions which the practical knowledge of Members on both sides of the House has supplied. The changes in the machinery have, I believe, been advantageous. They are changes which I could hardly have ventured to suggest myself, although several of them I should have been glad to have embodied originally in the Bill had I believed it would have been feasible to carry them. The greatest difficulty we experienced in framing the Bill was that of dealing with the immense part of the kingdom which is within the metropolis—a difficulty which almost filled me with despair when I considered how it was to be met. The difficulty arose from the present position of all governmental and municipal arrangements in the metropolis, and I felt that if on the first introducing the Bill we had fastened on the difficulty, Members on both sides of the House would say we had undertaken too much. Well, Sir, the House took the matter up, and I now look forward not with despair, but with the greatest possible hope—with a well-grounded, sanguine expectation, that London will afford the first example of the success of this measure. I am glad to have an opportunity of stating to the Members of this House connected with London, and through them to the people of the metropolis, that, inasmuch as it has been settled by this Bill that as soon as it becomes law the Metropolitan Board by whom the arrangements will have to be conducted shall be elected, London itself will be in the proud position, befitting its place in the kingdom, of first setting to work to apply and carry out this Education Bill. I believe it will successfully accomplish the work. If it does not the example will be one most dangerous. [Mr. MORLEY: Hear, hear!] I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for

Bristol evidently taking that remark to himself, because few persons have more influence and can do more to accomplish the great object we have in view in the City of London than he can himself. My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Melly), who spoke in words very far too kind about myself, alluded to the great powers which will be possessed by the Education Department and the responsibility which will rest on it. They are indeed, Sir, very great. And nothing but the magnitude of the task and the arduous character of the duty we have to perform would have warranted us in asking the House to intrust us with such powers. My noble Friend the President of the Council and myself, and the Government generally, are perfectly aware of the magnitude of the powers that are intrusted to us and the consequent onerous responsibility that devolves upon us. And, perhaps, here I may be allowed to make one remark, which I feel is due from me in common fairness and justice. I am very glad, and I believe the House has reason to be glad, that, whatever may be the ultimate decision as to whether there shall be a special Educational Minister or not, considering the immense difficulty of the task we have to perform—I say the House has reason to rejoice that two Educational Ministers will be intrusted with the carrying out of this Bill. I have happened to stand before the country rather prominently in this matter, because I had charge of the Bill. But I feel bound to acknowledge the assistance given me by my noble Friend, and I should be very hopeless indeed of being able to get the Bill in work throughout the country if I did not feel I should have his able assistance and superintendence in putting it into operation. But we shall, notwithstanding, want assistance outside the House, as we have had within it. Nor do I fear much those statements that we are to have an agitation—and my reason is this—I know my hon. Friends who make those statements have as earnest desires as ourselves for the advancement of education, and if they find that we are really trying to meet the difficulties of our task, they would be the last to try to frustrate our efforts before we have had a fair opportunity of showing whether we were justified in the hopes we entertained. I will not detain the House any longer except simply to say this. When we brought forward our measure circumstances generally were very different from what they are now, and I am sure even those who desired that the Bill should be postponed for another year will on this ground be glad that they did not obtain their wish; for, looking to the terrible events transpiring around us in Europe, we must all feel how much more difficult it would be to carry through a complicated measure of this kind next Session than it has been this. This terrible war may suggest to us one other thought. We may consider ourselves fortunate that we are preserved from this contest, and we hope and trust we may continue to be so. But we must remember we have enemies around us from which we have not been preserved, and against which even peace and prosperity give us little security. Our very prosperity creates such foes. We have before us the great task of putting down the invading armies of ignorance, misery, and destitution, which swarm in upon us like insects and feed on the trees of our commercial prosperity. It is vain for us to suppose that peace will secure us from great national evils if we do not conquer the swarming hosts of ignorance. Efforts have indeed been made to face this dangerous foe, but this is the first time national machinery has been devised for grappling with those great evils, and that the State has set itself to work and organized itself to put down ignorance. It is the first attempt in favour of national education; and I am confident that the country generally and our constituents will not think we have wasted our time in taking this first step. Some of my hon. Friends who have paid great attention to this measure, and who care as much for religion as any of us—for I am sure I have no right to place myself above or even on an equality in this respect with some of them—have differed from us in their care for religious interests. Yet I believe that they themselves, when they come to reflect, will not regret that we have not by Act of Parliament built a wall around the schools which are to receive the outcast and the destitute, through which a ray of Christian light could not penetrate, and that, in the interests of freedom, we did not get Parliament to declare that parents who desire for their children religious combined with secular instruction should not be allowed to have their wishes gratified.

ARMY ENLISTMENT BILL—[Bill 106.]

(Mr. Secretary Cardwell, Captain Vivian.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, there were two points in the Bill against which he had before protested, and must once more protest. He would, however, hope that the Bill might work better than he anticipated.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

GUN LICENCES BILL—[Bill 134.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stansfeld.)

THIRD READING

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. C. S. READ said, since this Bill had been printed no opportunity had been offered for discussing its main principles; and he therefore, by the leave of the House, would make a short and final protest before this tyrannical and unnecessary Bill was read a third time. When new taxes were levied it was generally supposed some fresh Revenue was wanted, but this year the Chancellor had an overflowing Exchequer, and, to show the country how little he needed money, in the original Bill the right hon. Gentleman proposed to remit the £150,000 now paid for game certificates. The game certificates had been retained; but a practical exemption from the new tax was granted to some 50,000 sporting gentlemen, for the £3 certificates were in future to include gun licences. They were told that it was to be a register of fire-arms, but it would be a most imperfect one. A man might keep any number of guns in his house, and a rich sportsman who paid for one certificate could use any number in the field, and his servants, who carried them or loaded for him would be exempt. Again, it was said that the Bill was to restrain the increasing use of revolvers; but a man could keep a revolver in his house, could practise with it on his premises, and, as there was no right to search his person, he could carry it about him for years and never pay the tax. Further, this Bill was to repress shooting on the road; but hon. Members were aware that an Act already existed by which anyone firing a gun upon or within 25 yards of a highway was liable to a fine of 40s. And when it was argued that the Bill would prevent accidents by the careless use of fire-arms, it should be remembered that such accidents were much more common in "the house and the curtilage thereof" than they were in the field. It was not for him to criticize the Act of a Liberal Government for placing a tax upon the staple trade of mighty Birmingham, but he did believe it would be as unpopular, as it would be unfair, to impose restrictions upon the honest livelihood and innocent pleasures of the lower middle class. He could not forget the happy days he passed in his school holidays when he shot wood-pigeons, fieldfares, and rabbits; and he knew a farmer would look twice before he paid 10s. each for his sons to carry a gun. But his chief objection to this Bill was that it imposed a new agricultural tax, for it was not to be supposed every able-bodied farmer would turn crow-boy, and if any other hands than his own used a gun for the purpose of scaring birds he must pay the 10s. licence. He contended that a gun was absolutely essential to a farmer; that, as it had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford, Government might as well impose a tax upon a plough. The only bright spot that he could see in the Bill was that it would discourage poaching. As it originally stood, he had expressed an opinion that it would lead to the destruction of all outlying game; but the retention of the game certificates would prevent that evil. The professional poacher would no doubt pay the gun tax with even more readiness than he did the old game certificate. On the other hand, the pot-hunter and the hedge-poacher would find his occupation more difficult; but, as that was in favour of the preservation of game, it might not commend itself to hon. Members opposite. He thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the attention to which he had listened to his suggestions, and for the concessions the right hon. Gentleman had made. He had no fault to find with the Government, for they made no move to rescind his Amendment which would have exempted all occupiers of land from a tax on crow-guns. That Motion, which was carried last night, came from the county Gentlemen who sat around him, and he knew full well that the British farmers when they paid the new tax would think with pain and grief that it was their own friends who voted against exempting them from this fresh burden. He could not understand how it was that so many Conservative Members had made such a mistake; he however feared the truth was this—that although they loved their agricultural constituents much they loved their game ten times more.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he regarded this measure as obnoxious on several grounds. First, it was a concession on the part of the Government to the game preservers. Secondly, it was unconstitutional, in that its effect would be to disarm the country to a great extent; and in the present disturbed state of Europe he thought it well that every ploughboy in the land should know how to aim a gun and pull a trigger. Thirdly, the incidence of taxation it proposed was excessively unfair, it being in the nature of a poll tax. And, fourthly, from the frequency and impunity with which its provisions would be evaded, the passing of such a measure as this had a tendency to induce a contempt for the law, and break down the minor morals of the population.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, as being no preserver of game, he had no such motive in supporting this Bill as that attributed to its supporters by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor). He believed the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. O. S. Read) had misrepresented the motives of those sitting on his own side of the House who supported the Bill. For his own part he did not believe that the Bill would in any way promote the preservation of game. He supported the Bill on the sole ground that it would prove useful in securing a registration of arms in this country.

MR. PELL said, he regretted that so many hon. Members should have misunderstood the object of the Amendment which he moved on a former occasion, and that some of those who had supported it when first proposed should afterwards have voted against it. He objected to this measure because he believed it would be constantly evaded, and because he believed any system of legislation having that result to be bad.

MR. WHALLEY said, he considered that the measure was uncalled for and not justified on any principle, financial or otherwise. Its provisions were aimed at the most orderly and peaceable portion of the community.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he must protest against Norfolk being regarded as England, and he thought it unfair, after the concessions made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that hon. Gentlemen should characterize this as a bad Bill. He voted originally for the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. O. S. Read), which had been reversed; but when he found that it would make a distinction between rich and poor he voted that it should be struck out. He thought the Bill, on the whole, would work fairly, and he therefore should support it.

MR. FORDYCE said, he should oppose the Bill, which he regarded as a Game Law Bill in disguise. He spoke on behalf of a large agricultural county (Aberdeenshire). Should the Bill be passed it would be very disastrous to the Liberalism of Scotland.

MR. MACFIE said, the 10s. tax would operate unjustly and unequally between the rich man and the poor. He held that in these times that man was the best friend of his country who encouraged every honest man, young and old, to accustom himself to the use of arms. He (Mr. Macfie) had no fear of the people, and he must deprecate the taking away from them of a privilege which from time immemorial they had enjoyed in this free and happy land.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that this was a retrograde step in legislation. Game preserving would be favoured by it. One reason, perhaps, which the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) who differed from many who sat on the same Bench, had for introducing this measure was that he had no confidence in the democracy, and was therefore anxious to promote any legislation which would take away the power of reaction from the lower orders. This was a Bill full of exceptions. Why was not the Volunteer to pay 10s. for his rifle, while his neighbour who might be poorer had got to pay the tax? The Bill was against the unanimous opinion of the best supporters of the Government. In order that a Division might be taken upon it, he would move that the Bill be read the third time upon this day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Craufurd.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he thought the Government had been very unjustly attacked on this occasion. He should support the Bill, although he did not agree with all its details. The Bill had lost a great deal of its original character; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had gone a long way to meet the objections of country gentlemen, had reduced the tax from £1 to 10s., and had made a number of concessions which would improve the working of the measure.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that the Bill would fall very hard on the farmers, many of whom made no use of guns themselves, but employed persons to kill vermin on the land. As the Bill had given great dissatisfaction to the Scotch Members, he begged to suggest that Scotland should be omitted from its operation.

MR. J. WHITE said, he must express his regret that this Bill should have been introduced by the Government. There was a very ugly look about it, and although he had no apprehension of any invasion of our liberties by the Liberal Government on that Bench, yet it had always been a distinguishing mark of this country that the people might possess arms, and this Bill was a very grave invasion of what was always meant to be a common right. He recollected having read in his youth, in Aristotle, or some other teacher of the science of politics, that the distinction between a tyranny and a free country was this—that in a free country the citizens were allowed to have the free use of arms; but in a tyranny the use of arms was forbidden. On that account he was very sorry this distinguishing characteristic of our country should be invaded or set at naught. Though not an alarmist, he should be glad if every adult in this country at the present moment possessed a rifle, and knew how to use it. He trusted that it was not too late for the Government to reconsider their position, especially when they took into account the events now imminent on the Continent.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, that the conduct of the Government with regard to the Game Laws, taken in connection with their conduct with respect to this Bill, would excite the greatest possible dissatisfaction.

MR. PARKER said, he would suggest that it was not even now too late to withdraw the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, this Bill must stand or fall by the provisions it contains, and not by the motives of those who introduced it. I can assure my hon. Friends that there is no Gentleman in this House more innocent of any intention of propping up the Game Laws than myself. I do not care a pin for the Game Laws. One reason which I had for imposing an uniform tax of £1 on fire-arms was that I should have been very glad to separate any question of Revenue from the Game Laws. The less the collection of the Revenue is mixed up with matters that excite difference of opinion the better; and, therefore, I should have been very glad if I could have removed these questions of taxes on fire-arms to a less passionate arena than now exists. However, the opinion of the House is entirely against that, and I had no choice. The object of the Bill is to check lawless habits. In answer to those who say it is a sign of freedom that the lower classes should go armed, I say it is the greatest proof of the absence of freedom when every man goes armed. What is the use of civilized institutions, of assemblies like this, of law and of Judges, and of all the paraphernalia of justice, if all it comes to is that every man is to be left to be the avenger of his own quarrel? You might as well go and live with the Sioux Indians, who are not embarrassed with all this trouble, and who are not called upon to sit here all day and all night. If every man is to carry a deadly weapon, and is to be a law to himself and to his neighbours, there is no end of confusion. No doubt, at the time of the Plantagenets, when the King ruled by an immense body of troops whom he kept continually about him, as a check upon the encroachments of the King, every man did carry arms, so as to rise in rebellion and coerce the King when he went beyond public opinion; but, happily, in our times, as for the last 100 years, we act upon a better plan; we have allowed the nation to be represented here; and instead of fighting out our quarrels in the open field, we settle them over this Table. Why men should think it a retrograde step to restrict by a moderate licence the indiscriminate carrying of arms I cannot for a moment conceive. I am sorry I cannot tell the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) where he read the passage he cited, and if it were not for the high authority I attach to his accuracy, I should have thought he never read it at all. I think, however, I know what he was referring to. Aristotle does call it a sign of tyranny for a King to be defended by strangers, because he cannot trust his own subjects, and a sign of a free country that a King should be guarded by his subjects. That is different from every man being armed. When I introduced this Bill, I quoted a passage from Thucydides, where he speaks of the free Athenians being the first among the Greeks to give up the habit of wearing arms, whereby life became more civilized and humane. I think it is a good object to discourage the lower classes from habitually carrying deadly weapons. Though I care nothing about the Game Laws, on behalf of the morality of this country I wish to keep the poor out of crime. It is a good object to prevent poaching as far as we can, and there is no sentiment more mawkish than that of investing the practice of poaching with any sort of romance. It may do for making pretty stories and idylls; but nobody knows better than I do—for few have seen more desperate criminals than I have—that poaching is the beginning of all wickedness. You begin with the boy in the field; you put a gun in his hand to frighten away the birds; at first he is so frightened that he dares not lift it, and he rests it against a gate and shuts both his eyes when he fires. He soon gets over that, and gradually he becomes a marksman. Sport is a natural taste with almost every Englishman, and the youth goes on from one thing to another until he becomes a poacher. He gets into bad society, makes criminal associates, and goes from bad to worse, until he is happy at finding himself in Botany Bay. I wish to check that kind of demoralization, without reference to the Game Laws, and we cannot do anything more efficient to check it than putting a moderate restraint upon the use of fire-arms. If a man wants to use fire-arms in the defence of his country he can join a Volunteer Association. This habit of carrying fire-arms has grown inveterate, until in London there are 100 complaints a day of persons shooting everything which comes in their way, such as pigeons, fowls, and cats. It seems to me that the thing has become perfectly intolerable; and, having a due regard to the interests of the Exchequer, I propose to keep people as far as I can out of crime, and to prevent them disturbing the peace of the country.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, they were not legislating for Greek republics, and there were others besides little boys in the country; therefore, while giving the Chancellor of the Exchequer all possible credit for paternal considerations, he must oppose the Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to limit the provisions of the Bill he introduced to financial objects, and ought not to trespass upon the domain of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. This Bill, he (Mr. Newdegate) believed, was preliminary to an Arms Act for England. Hitherto we had passed Arms Acts for Ireland, because of Fenian outbreaks; but there had been complaints of the restraints imposed upon the Irish people, because there were others besides little boys and Fenians in Ireland. In a financial point of view there was no justification for this Bill, which was a police measure introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would impose undue restrictions not only upon little boys, but upon grown men, and it would seriously affect the trade of large centres of population.

STATUE OF VISCOUNT GOUGH.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

COLONEL NORTH said, he rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that sufficient gun-metal shall be issued for the construction of the statue about to be erected in Dublin to commemorate the services of the late Field Marshal Viscount Gough, K.P., G.C.B., G.C.S.I. The committee for the erection of this memorial statue had applied to the War Office for the necessary gun-metal, which Mr. Foley, the sculptor, estimated at about eight tons, and the answer received was that a free issue could not be given, but that the metal required could be had at £70 per ton. The services of Lord Gough extended over a period of no less than 75 years. Previous to the Peninsula War he had served at the capture of the Cape of Good Hope, at the capture of the Dutch fleet in Saldanha Bay, in the attack on Porto Rico, and at the capture of Surinam. During the Peninsula War he commanded the 87th Regiment, which had since been named the Royal Irish Fusiliers. At Talavera he had a horse shot under him, and was afterwards severely wounded in the side. For his conduct in this action the Duke of Wellington subsequently recommended that his lieutenant-colonelcy should be ante-dated to the date of his despatch, thus making him the first officer who ever received brevet rank for service performed in the field at the head of his regiment. At Barrosa his regiment captured the eagle of the 8th French regiment. At Tarifa he was wounded in the head. At Vittoria his regiment captured the bâton of Marshal Jourdan. At Nivelles he was severely wounded. Lord Gough also was present at Orthes and Toulouse. In 1841 he commanded a land force at Canton, and was made a G.C.B. In 1842 he commanded our land forces during nearly the whole of the operations in China, and was made a Baronet. In 1843 to 1849 he commanded the British troops in India, and after a succession of victories over the Sikhs, he was raised to the Peerage, being made a Viscount after the crowning victory of Gujerat. Only eight tons of gun-metal were asked for, and it was right to state to the House that Lord Gough had on various occasions captured no fewer than 1,415 guns, of which 536 were brass and 879 were iron guns. Mr. Foley, a most eminent Irish sculptor, had undertaken to make the equestrian statue, and he (Colonel North) could not believe that the British House of Commons would refuse the eight tons of metal necessary for a purpose which would be most gratifying to the Irish people. He concluded by moving the Address.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that sufficient gun metal shall be issued for the construction of the statue about to be erected in Dublin to commemorate the services of the late Field Marshal Viscount Gough, K.P., G.C.B., G.C.S.I.,"—(Colonel North),

—instead thereof.

Mr. W. H. GREGORY said, he hoped the Government would not refuse to accede to the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend. This was an appeal which should not be made in vain. It was the voice of all Ireland that spoke—Whig and Tory, Protestant and Catholic, all were united to do honour to that gallant old warrior, who, when living, was the pride of his country from his great military exploits, who was the joy of all around him from the simplicity and generosity of his character, and whom no Irish—aye, or English—soldier who had served under him ever passed without touching his hat and saying—"Long life to him—God bless him!" Such men as these their countrymen delight to honour, and now they had all classes and persuasions of Irishmen paying in their contributions for a national monument to Lord Gough. Everyone who had connected himself with the undertaking had acted with generosity and public spirit. The contributions were liberal considering the means of the contributors. The corporation of Dublin had offered any site in Dublin which the committee might select for the erection of the statue. Mr. Foley, the eminent sculptor to whom the work had been intrusted, had offered, in case the statue were to be made equestrian, to charge nothing, save expenses out of pocket, for the construction of the horse. In only one quarter was a niggardly spirit to be traced, and that was in the Government of the country whose Eastern Empire was rescued from the greatest peril by the achievements of Lord Gough.

The Treasury had refused to grant four or five guns for the metal work of the statue. If that were not granted the statue could not be equestrian, and the monument would be deprived of the grandeur and dignity which it ought to possess. Were they asking an unprecedented boon? He believed they were not. He was informed that the Government had sanctioned the issue of 40 tons of gun-metal for the statue of the Prince Consort just about to be erected in the Park, and a grant of gun-metal was made also for the statue of Lord Hardinge. And the Government had done right. He contended that the Government of the country would always do well by coming forward on occasions such as this, when a feeling so universal prevailed as to the claims of a great citizen for posthumous honours. It was easy to separate those occasions which were a nation's duty and a nation's will from those cases where affection or vanity or interest proposed a monument. His hon. and gallant Friend and himself were not the mouthpieces of a few devoted friends and admirers, but of the whole of Ireland. Well, indeed, might Lord Gough's services, as detailed by his gallant Friend, seem to warrant this claim. If Vendôme was called the "Tapisseur de Nôtre Dame," the "Upholsterer of Nôtre Dame," from the banners and flags of enemies with which he decorated its walls, so might Lord Gough be called "The Purveyor of Woolwich Artillery Yard," from the number of guns which he captured in war and made over to the arsenal—something approaching 1,400, according to the statement of his gallant Friend. Not one shilling of prize money did Lord Gough receive or ask for on account of these spoils of war, of which the country has had the glory and the benefit; and now he (Mr. Gregory) asked, when it was a question of half-a-dozen useless guns in order to make a worthy national monument, were they going to refuse a nation's request with the reply that they were too poor to do honour to this great old captain, or too pedantic to relax an imaginary rule?

COLONEL SYKES said, he had had the honour of Lord Gough's acquaintance for many years, and he had never seen a man who was more completely the type of a soldier for his frankness, his straightforwardness, and resolution of purpose. Lord Gough had rendered great services, and it would be a disgrace to this country if the paltry amount of a few tons of metal needed for his statue, and which were lying like lumber in the yards at Woolwich, should be refused.

MR. STANSFELD said, he trusted that his reply would not come under the character of being pedantic, but he must observe that the Motion amounted to a demand for public money; and it was his duty to state the conditions and regulations which had been adopted not by the present Government, but by preceding Governments, with respect to demands of this nature. He had not the Papers by him, and he might be wrong as to a year or two; but, if his memory served him aright, the last occasion on which a direct grant of gun-metal was made was in 1858 for a statue of Sir Isaac Newton at Grantham. The matter was considered not in reference to the question whether or not, or in what cases it was desirable to make these contributions, but in reference to what his hon. Friend called technical and pedantic considerations. It was felt not to be advisable that the War Office, whose function was not to make public grants either of money or money's worth, should be permitted, as a matter of departmental discretion, to give away a portion of the stores it held on the part of the nation for a specific purpose; and the Treasury decided that, whenever it should be thought proper to make grants of gun-metal, a Vote should first be taken for the cost of the guns as old metal, and that the War Office should be repaid out of that Vote for the amount of stores taken from its possession. Of late years further change had been adopted. It had been thought advisable to put the thing on a still more distinct ground, and to say—"If you want the metal, you may buy it of the War Department or elsewhere; but if you come to the Government for a grant of what, practically speaking, is money, you must ask for money, and not for the money's worth." If it was thought advisable to ask the Government to aid in the erection of a statue, the request must be addressed to the Government in an explicit shape. Government must be asked for a Vote of money, and then they knew what responsibility they undertook in that respect. They must propose a Vote to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons would know what amount, if any, should be granted. Without at all entering into the question whether it was advisable that the House of Commons should be asked to grant a sum of money for such a purpose, he must remind them that, in recent times, in a very notable case, a grant of this kind had been refused; no public grant had been made for a statue to the memory of the most eminent scientific man of the day—Mr. Faraday. An application for gun-metal for a statue to Lord Palmerston had also been refused. He hoped the House would not assent to the Motion in its present form, because to do so would go to upset and rescind the resolutions at which successive Governments had arrived on this question during the last ten years.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that the two cases to which the Secretary to the Treasury had referred were those of civilians, but the case of Lord Gough was widely different. This was not a mere question of pounds, shillings, and pence; it was intimately connected with the military honour of the country. He had heard appeals even from the Treasury Bench made to the military spirit of the nation, and to refuse this grant to the unanimous desire of the Irish people in memory of the illustrious hero of Gujerat would, in fact, be ignoring that very martial spirit to which they at other times thought it becoming to appeal. If the Treasury were willing to give the money it would not be regarded by those who took an interest in the statue as at all commensurate in value with the gun-metal which was asked, and which would form the most appropriate national contribution.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, he could not help thinking that the grounds on which the refusal of the Treasury had been put were not only pedantic but penurious. The people of Ireland took great interest in this matter. But Lord Gough was not merely an Irishman; as a soldier he had shed lustre on the arms of England. Where all united in the application it ought not to be met on technical grounds.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was not the least wish to be either penurious or hypertechanical about this matter, but now that very strict methods were adopted in the care of public stores and the audit of public accounts the precedents of old times did not apply, and the old plan with regard to these appeals was quite different from the present practice. The old notion was that the War Office held these stores as a sort of property of their own, and when a monument was to be erected to any distinguished soldier like Lord Gough, application was made to the War Office for assistance, and a subscription was made out of these stores in the mode recommended by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel North). But now the stores must be accounted for as money, and the Government had no right to take and appropriate them to any purpose other than as directed by a Vote of the House. It would be a proceeding directly in contempt of the House. It was not that they wanted to throw any obstacle in the way of the erection of the proposed statue, or to oppose the wishes of the House; but they could not, consistently with their duty, accede to the present Motion. Lord Gough was distinguished for his devotion to the public service, and he was one of the last men who would wish that any violation of the rules of the public service should occur in any matter relating to himself. Whether it would be right that the country should subscribe to a statue to commemorate the services of a great and illustrious soldier like Lord Gough was a question which it was fair and reasonable for the House to consider; and what he would undertake on the part of the Government was to make an estimate of what was wanted and to bring before the House a Vote on the subject, and let the thing be considered on the question of a money grant. But the Government could not take these stores and give them away. He doubted whether that could be done without an Act of Parliament. If the hon. and gallant Member would be so kind as not to press his Motion the Government would give the House the fullest opportunity of considering the question.

DR. BALL said, he did not see how the accounts could be deranged by giving this grant in gun-metal instead of in specie. He had no doubt the Resolutions alluded to by the Secretary to the Treasury were mere departmental resolutions, and did not bind Parliament at all. It might be for the convenience of the Treasury that a certain form of account should be adopted; but was there any Act of Parliament to preclude their adopting the course which had been followed on former occasions, when gun-metal was given for the statue of Lord Hardinge, again for the statue of the Prince Consort; and, thirdly, when the actual cannon taken in the Peninsula were used for the statue of the Duke of Wellington in Hyde Park. For his part, he believed that a mere gift of money would not be satisfactory. Indeed, he went further, and said that the proper material was the actual cannon taken. With the number of cannon mentioned by his hon. and gallant Friend as having been taken by Lord Gough at this moment in the possession of the nation, were they to be told by the Government that though they were willing to make a money grant, they would not give them that miserable grant of eight tons weight of metal? There was a strong feeling about this matter. There had been a very strong expression of opinion upon the subject throughout Ireland, and in the metropolitan city of Ireland a meeting, to which his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel North) had referred, had been attended by men of the highest station and position in the country, and a demand was made, in the strongest terms, that the metal of some of the guns actually captured by Lord Gough should be applied for this purpose. No doubt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had now promised to assent to the proposal, if it were made in another form and in another way. The right hon. Gentleman had given that assent after a great deal of pressure from Irish Members on his own side of the House; but it should be remembered that not even a hint of that kind was given in the replies to the committee, when they made applications about this statue. On the contrary, the tenour of the reply was—"Buy the metal for yourselves;" or, "We will sell it you, you finding the money, at the rate of £70 a ton." That was the answer given by the Government to the simple demand of the Irish people. What had the Government done with the cannon? They had given cannon to be placed in the different towns in Ireland. He had seen them rotting in the open air, utterly useless for every purpose except to be looked at. Surely they could afford to give guns for a noble purpose like this.

Where there was a will there was a way. It was in the power of the House to cut through these Resolutions, and to declare that the recognition of the services of this great man should be made in the manner proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had not been present throughout the debate, because the right hon. Gentleman had a strong feeling of sympathy with the Irish people, and was always actuated by a generous policy. It was difficult thoroughly to appreciate the peculiar circumstances of the country at this moment. Though every man would pray that we might not be dragged into a frightful and prolonged war, there was no knowing how soon we might be obliged again to resort to that part of the Empire which, in former times, had furnished some of the best of our soldiers. It would be easy, however, to conceive the gratification of the peasants of Tipperary and Connamara, and the readiness with which they would respond to such a call, should they be told that when it was intended to do honour to the memory of the great old Gough, the noble old Irish soldier, there was in the way some wretched cobweb, some piece of red tapeism, over which they not only broke their own noses, but even brought dishonour upon those with whom they acted. They utterly refused a money grant. They were not so poor in Ireland that they could not raise £500 for this object if they required it; but what they wanted was this special mode of honouring a man who had done honour and service to his country and the Empire. If a country did not wish to do honour to its great men the spirit of the nation was gone. He would remind the House that no difficulty was found in the way of supplying gun-metal for the purpose of erecting a statue to the memory of Sir Titus Salt's father, who certainly had done nothing requiring that he should be honoured by the employment of material earned by the blood of British soldiers. In his own city (Cork) there were guns which had been taken from the Russians; and he believed that if these guns were generously given it would be better than 10 recruiting sergeants.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was very sorry to do anything which might put an end to a debate which had led to the exhibition of so much patriotic eloquence. No one who had listened to the earnest and able speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Dr. Ball) would have dreamt that it proceeded from one of his profession or judicial character, while the spirit displayed by the right hon. Gentleman had been equalled, if not surpassed, in the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire). His hon. Friend talked with contempt of money; but still gun-metal was money, and to overlook that fact would be a breach of duty on the part of the Government. There were two distinct questions before the House; but there was really no substantial matter between them over which there need be any quarrel. One question was—was it desirable to make a contribution at the public charge to the statue of Lord Gough? and the other was—if so, was it desirable to make that contribution in the form of gun-metal? Now, he felt sure that hon. Gentlemen would not wish the Government to break down a rule which had been one of the most difficult achievements of financial reform during the last half-century—the rule that none of the public property should be disposed of in kind. The effect of that mode of disposing of public property was that when anything was given away, the public had no means of knowing when it was given, or of knowing what was given. If there were a corrupt motive influencing the Government their course would be to rush into the arms of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel North), and thank him for his Motion. They might establish all the rules of account they liked; but if the House once allowed a Government to do what it pleased with public property in kind without making any account, they did all in their power to promote a system by which the plunder of public property could be carried on to any extent. As to the Government making a contribution to Lord Gough's statue, he was sorry that the matter had never been brought before himself, or his right hon. Friend near him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), except in the form of an application for gun-metal, an application which their duty absolutely precluded them from complying with. It had been asked what had become of the old cannon captured in the Russian War, and it was urged that a great mistake had been made in distributing these trophies all over the country. He confessed he himself held that opinion, and was sorry that that plan had been adopted. But he did not think that was a precedent which should be referred to. It was only of late years that the old vicious system of dealing with public property in kind had been scotched; but the rule had now been well established. With reference, however, to his hon. and gallant Friend's Motion, it was not necessary that the Government should be asked to break through any rules. He confessed he saw nothing improper in their making a contribution towards the statue of Lord Gough. He was afraid, however, that, having said that, he should shock his hon. Friend the Member for Cork by saying that that contribution must, in the first instance, be a contribution in money. But there was further not the slightest objection to pursuing a very simple operation in stating that a certain quantity of gun-metal should be given, the grant being accounted for in money. He would suggest that the hon. and gallant Member should either withdraw his Motion or consent to an Amendment, for there would be no objection on the part of the Government to an Address praying for the gun-metal to be issued, and adding—"and that this House will make good the cost of the same," by which means they would avoid breaking through the present system of administration.

COLONEL NORTH assented to the addition of these words.

Another Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that sufficient gun metal shall be issued for the construction of the statue about to be erected in Dublin to commemorate the services of the late Field Marshal Viscount Gough, K.P., G.C.B., G.C.S.I., and that this House will make good the cost of the same,"—(Colonel North),—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that sufficient gun metal shall be issued for the construction of the statue about to be erected in Dublin to commemorate the services of the late Field Marshal Viscount Gough, K.P., G.C.B., G.C.S.I., and that this House will make good the cost of the same.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,072, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1871, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in the Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly paid from the Hereditary Revenue."

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he would move the omission of the item of £217 13s. for providing Queen's Plates. Horse-racing led to betting and gambling, against which the House should set its face.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £217 13s. for Queen's Plates, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Alderman Lusk.)

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he should vote for the reduction of the Vote, for there was no doubt that the system of betting upon horse-racing was doing immense mischief in this country.

MR. P. WYKEHAM-MARTIN said, he was told last year that no Queen's Plates were voted in England. Why, then, should money be voted to Scotland and Ireland to provide them?

MR. M'LAREN said, he agreed that the three kingdoms should be put on a footing of equality in this respect, and he should quite approve of the item being struck out of the Vote if the same measure of justice were applied to Ireland. He wished to know whether Government had taken into consideration the recommendations of the Department Commission with regard to this class of expenditure in Scotland?

MR. ANDERSON said, he was opposed to any Vote for horse-racing. The money was originally given to improve the breed of horses; but the modern system of horse-racing had had a contrary effect.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, he never saw in the newspapers any betting quotations for the races to which objection had been made, and these races tended to improve the cultivation of stamina and endurance in horses. There was now a great desire to revert to long races, and he hoped the efforts of the turf reformers would be successful. At the present moment it would be better not to do away with those Plates, for he did not think equality would be promoted by striking out the Queen's Plates for Scotland and Ireland as long as the Queen's Plates for England were paid for out of the Civil List.

MR. STANSFELD said, he was unable to agree entirely with either side on this question. He did not think these Plates encouraged gambling, and he certainly did not think they could do much to improve the breed of horses in the country. He was not particularly enamoured of this item, and the main reason for retaining it was its antiquity, these Plates having come upon the Estimates from the Hereditary Revenue, and having been given by the Crown or Parliament consecutively, the Edinburgh Plate since 1726, the Caledonia Hunt Plate since 1788, and the Archers' Plate since 1677. What the Government were anxious to do, however, was to collect Scotch opinion on the subject, and be guided mainly by it.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that for the last few years the opinion of the Scotch Members had been against the grant. If the Government was to be guided on that occasion by the opinions of Scotch Members alone, they declined the grant altogether.

MR. MACFIE said, he was for continuing it for another year.

MR. STANSFELD said, he thought there was a clear balance of Scotch opinion against the Vote, and he would, therefore, withdraw it.

MR. W. H. GREGORY begged to say that the balance of Irish opinion was decidedly in favour of the Vote.

Question put, and agreed to.

Original Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

(1.) £3,854 7s., to complete the sum for Exchequer and other Offices, Scotland.

(2.) £9,312, to complete the sum for Fishery Board, Scotland.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would beg again to ask the Government whether they meant to deal with these Boards in accordance with the recommendations of the departmental Commission that had made its Report some time since?

MR. STANSFELD said, the Government were waiting to consider the Report which had just been, or must soon be, presented by the Committee on the Poor Law Board, when all these subjects would be considered together.

MR. MACFIE said, he thought the Vote of £3,000 for the repair and enlargement of the Fishery Harbours should be augmented.

MR. M'LAREN said, he disapproved of this Board altogether. There was no more reason for the Government interfering with the fishery trade than there was for interfering with the cotton trade.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £4,867, to complete the sum for General Register Office, Scotland.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. CRAUFURD said, that he had some time since given Notice that he should move to reduce the Vote by £1,000, on the ground that the Government had taken on itself to fill up a vacancy in the Department without waiting for the Report of the Committee on the Scotch Poor Law, and the non-reporting of which his hon. Friend now alleged as a Reason why Her Majesty's Government had not dealt with this departmental report. It was very extraordinary that one Department of the Government should act in defiance of the recommendation of another Department, without waiting for the Report of the Committee upstairs; and that another Department of Her Majesty's Government should state here as a reason for not taking into consideration the recommendation of their own Commission, the fact that the Committee upstairs had not yet reported. He should not, however, press his Motion; but early next Session, when the Report of the Committee had been in the hands of Members sufficiently long to enable them to carefully consider the evidence, he should call attention to the whole subject, and he thought he should be able to show that it would be expedient to amalgamate this Board with the Board of Supervision. He would not press the subject further, because time would not allow; but when he came to lay before the House the manner in which Scotch Members had been treated by the Government in that House, and by a Cabinet Minister in "another place," and when they reflected on the manner in which Scotch Business had been treated that Session, he thought that he should be able to show strong arguments against similar treatment in the future.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Report of the Departmental Commission had satisfied the Treasury that the Scotch Boards were very well managed, and that there was no reason to make any great change.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next;

Committee also report Progress; to sit again this day.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

SALARY OF THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LAMBERT, who had given Notice to draw the attention of the House to the salary of the First Lord of the Treasury, and to move that, in the opinion of this House, it is inadequate, and ought to be increased to £8,000 per year, said that nothing had been further from his intention than to withdraw the Motion which he had on the Paper, and nothing should have induced him to do so, from the general support which had been promised to it by Members of this House, and which would have insured its being carried, had he not had a communication from the only quarter which could influence him, which induced him to withdraw it in its present form, which he did with great reluctance. He should not, however, let the subject drop, and now begged to give Notice that he would, at the earliest period next Session, move the following Motion :—

“ That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the salary of the First Lord of the Treasury, and other official salaries.”

ARMY—OFFICERS OF VOLUNTEER CORPS—EVESHAM RIFLE CORPS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he rose to call attention to the circumstances under which two tradesmen of Evesham had been refused commissions in the Rifle Corps on account of their social position. About two years ago the Evesham Rifle company was, through unwillingness to serve, left entirely without officers. After a great deal of persuasion, the Mayor consented to be the captain, and Messrs. Cox and Phelps, two of the most respected and respectable tradesmen of the town, were afterwards induced to allow themselves to be proposed as lieutenant and ensign. The commandant of the corps to which the Evesham company belonged, Colonel Scobell, wrote to the Mayor that their names had been placed before the Lord Lieutenant, but that his Lordship did not consider their position such as to justify their appointment to the rank of officers. The Under Secretary of State for War, with whom he (Mr. P. A. Taylor) had communicated on the subject, had informed him that that statement in Colonel Scobell's letter was not strictly accurate, no formal application having been made to the Lord Lieutenant; and Lord Lyttelton was certainly one of the last men whom he should have expected to act in such a manner. As far as he himself (Mr. P. A. Taylor) was concerned, he could only say that he was entirely disconnected with the part of the country in which the gentlemen in question resided. Their political opinions were, he believed, entirely opposed to his own, nor did he know until after he had given Notice on the subject that the Lord Lieutenant who was concerned in the matter was Lord Lyttelton. These gentlemen were absolutely unexceptionable. They were members of the Town Council, and had been members of the corps ever since its formation in 1860, and their appointment was essential to the well-being of the corps; and nevertheless the commissions were refused simply on account of their social position. At a meeting of the Rifle Corps, resolutions approving of their nomination were passed unanimously, and those resolutions were concurred in by the previous captains of the company. He had, he might add, brought the matter under the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, who had received him, as he did on all occasions, with a courtesy which was not remarkable in him, but which contrasted very favourably with the receptions of other right hon. Gentlemen who sat on the same Bench. As to the reason why the commissions had not been given there could be no doubt. He was informed by a gentleman resident at Worcester, that all persons resident in that city who were in a similar walk of life with those proposed for commissions were highly indignant at the affront put upon them; and the local Press had emphatically protested. He had heard that the real obstacle in the way of granting the commissions was the objection raised by certain officers of a neighbouring company, which constituted part of the same corps, the 2nd Worcestershire battalion. It seemed to him well-nigh impossible, however, that such a spirit of snobbery should prevail among gentlemen who only met for battalion drill during a few days in the year. Rank and station were regarded less and less every day in the Army and Navy and the Civil Service, and a fortiori they ought not to be taken into account in the appointment of officers to a popular body like the Volunteers. He might mention, also, that the system of exclusiveness, of which he complained, was not in operation in other parts of the country. His Worcester correspondent remarked, however, that “cathedral cities are always, more or less, aristocratic places, and we are no exception to the general rule in this respect.” Capacity for usefulness, and not social position, was the proper test of fitness in such cases. In conclusion, he begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

COLONEL BOURNE, in rising to second the Motion, said, he would lay before the House the actual circumstance connected with this unfortunate affair. It was doubly unfortunate, because it happened at a juncture when we knew not what a day might bring forth, and it might tend to prevent a large number of those who took an interest in the Volunteer movement from joining it at the present time. In the first place, however, he might state that the Lord Lieutenant of the county had been somewhat unfairly treated, for, as far as he could learn, he was by no means to blame in regard to this transaction. He might remind the House that although all appointments of Volunteer officers were vested in the Lord Lieutenant, they in reality emanated from the colonels-commandant of the various regiments. Had the names of these gentlemen been properly placed before the Lord Lieutenant, he felt convinced there would have been no objection on his part to sign the commissions. The facts of the case were as follows:—Originally the Evesham corps consisted of about 100 members; but from one cause or another the officers gradually seceded from it. Two of them had held commissions in the Army, one having been a field officer. They found, however, that they could not give the time required for the discharge of their duties as Volunteer officers, and eventually it was found that the corps was dwindling down almost to nothing. Accordingly, a public meeting was called, at which there were present the major, the two late commanding officers, and the adjutant. The names of several persons were suggested for commissions, but they declined the proffered honour, and at last Mr. Phelps and Mr. Cox were induced by the meeting to allow their names to be submitted to the Lord Lieutenant for approval. Both of them, he might remark, were members of the Town Council, and highly-respectable tradesmen. Moreover, they had both served in the Volunteers since the commencement of the movement; both were sergeants, and one of them had acted as secretary of the corps; so that as far as drill was concerned they were highly efficient. It was with great reluctance that they allowed their names to be submitted to the Lord Lieutenant, and they only did so in deference to the wishes of their fellow-townsmen. Consequently, they had, in his opinion, been very hardly dealt with. Having himself been a commanding officer of Volunteers, he might state that these two gentlemen would have conferred credit on any corps, and if they had offered themselves to his regiment he should have been exceedingly pleased. He trusted that on a reconsideration of the facts the Lord Lieutenant would be pleased to reverse the decision he had come to, and would now no longer hesitate to sign their commissions.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "to make the appointment of Commissioned Officers in the Volunteer force dependant upon social position would, in the opinion of this House, be at variance with the principles on which that force has been established, and on the maintenance of which the hope of its permanence mainly depends,"—(Mr. Taylor,) —instead thereof.

MR. LYTELTON said, he had no complaint to make as regarded the temper with which this question had been introduced, but an omission had been made in the statement of facts. There was no doubt that the Evesham corps had been languishing for a considerable time, owing to the deficiency in the number of its officers, and that, at a certain meeting, these two most respectable tradesmen were pressed to take commissions, and that eventually they consented to do so. The proposal that they should be appointed was, of course, discussed at the time, and Colonel Scobell, commanding the battalion, on hearing a statement of the facts from the adjutant, made a communication to his noble Relative, the Lord Lieutenant, informing him, without making any reflection on their respectability, that the appointment of these men would not be received with satisfaction by the battalion, and that, in fact, their appointment would be unpopular. The Lord Lieutenant, knowing that Colonel Scobell was a competent judge of the feeling in the corps, advised him not to send in their names formally to him, and their names were not sent in. The anticipations of the colonel were justified, as was proved by the fact that when it was known that such appointments were contemplated, dissatisfaction was expressed by the officers. The Lord Lieutenant having received no formal recommendation was technically free from any part of the responsibility in the case; but he had no wish to escape from any responsibility which might be thought to attach to him. It had been the invariable custom for Lords Lieutenant not to send up to the War Office any names for commissions which had not been expressly recommended by the commanding officer of the battalion—and probably the House would not be inclined to disturb that rule—and fearing dissatisfaction would arise not only among the officers, but among the men, if these appointments were made, Lord Lyttelton, for the sake of securing the harmony and efficiency of the corps, did not wish to have the names in question recommended to him. He (Mr. Lyttelton) did not complain of the hon. Member for Leicester for having imputed a feeling of exclusiveness as to the motive which had actuated Lord Lyttelton—

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he had disclaimed any such belief.

MR. LYTTELTON said, those who knew the noble Lord would not suspect him of any aristocratic or exclusive basis in a matter of this kind. The Lord Lieutenant found the battalion had existed for 10 years in a high state of efficiency, and had never been officered from a class below a certain position, and he did not think it his duty to disturb that satisfactory state of things. He acted from no personal motive; and if the Resolution was adopted, as the feeling of the House seemed to be in its favour, the Lord Lieutenant would readily act in accordance with it, immediately the decision came to was conveyed to him through the War Office. For himself, he (Mr. Lyttelton) would add that, in his opinion, the principle of the Motion was in no way objectionable. He would be the last person to prescribe that want of high social position should disqualify a man from a commission in the Volunteer force. The state of affairs on the Continent impressed this upon him no less than the lamentable inadequacy of officers among Volunteers generally. [Colonel LINDSAY: No!] This was at least the case in his district. For these reasons he would be sorry to say "No" to the Motion; but, at the same time, he would deprecate its adoption as far as it might be construed into a censure upon the Lord Lieutenant. He therefore appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion, in the assurance that Lord Lyttelton would be the last man to allow want of social position to stand in the way of the real interests of the force, for whose harmony and efficiency he was mainly responsible.

MR. KNIGHT said, as the first Volunteer sworn in in Worcestershire, and the first colonel of the first battalion raised there, he wished to explain that the course adopted in most of the towns of Worcestershire had been to appoint for officers the natural leaders of the men—namely, the merchants, manufacturers, and professional men. All that Lord Lyttelton had to do in the matter was to appoint such officers as the commanding officer of the corps recommended. It was contrary to the principle that regulated Volunteer corps that persons who stood behind the counter should be appointed officers. As far as aristocrats were concerned there was only one in his corps, and that was the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, who was his second major, and an excellent officer he was too. It was absolutely necessary that the officers of the Volunteer corps should be gentlemen who left their offices when the working men who formed the rank and file of the corps left their work, and to whom they were well known.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, that as a commanding officer of a Volunteer corps, he selected his officers not on account of their social position, but because they were the best fitted to perform the duties to be discharged. When men were serving their country as Volunteers they all stood upon an equal footing, whether they were the sons of Dukes or served behind a counter. The commanding officer in appointing officers must look to the efficiency of the regiment, and not to the social position of the candidates, and were he to appoint a man who had rendered himself unpopular among his comrades, he would be defeating that object. He apprehended that no Lord Lieutenant would refuse to appoint men recommended for commissions by the commanding officer of the corps, unless he had some very good and sufficient reasons for so doing. While fully concurring in the sentiment of the Motion, he trusted that the hon. Member for Leicester would be satisfied with the feeling he had elicited from the House, and would withdraw it; otherwise he should feel bound to vote against it.

MR. CARDWELL said, he cheerfully admitted the temperate tone in which this question had been brought forward, and he thought that after the admirable speech of the hon. Member behind him, the son of the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Lyttelton), and after the general unanimity of opinion which had been expressed by the House, the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) would not be inclined to press his Motion. He (Mr. Cardwell) was convinced that nothing could be more fatal to the efficiency and value of the Volunteer Force than the notion that commissions in it were to be given away not with the view to promote the efficiency of the service, but on the ground of social position and other accidental circumstances. Among the many advantages that the Volunteer movement had conferred upon the country was the signal one of having tended to obliterate social distinctions, and to remove mischievous and ridiculous feelings of caste among men mutually engaged in the pursuit of an object which conduced to their own recreations and conferred great benefit upon the country. The hon. Member behind him had stated the facts of this particular case, and had shown that his noble father had not, in the slightest degree, been actuated by the ridiculous notions to which he (Mr. Cardwell) had alluded. Indeed, Lord Lyttelton held too distinguished a place in the republic of letters to be encumbered with any such cobwebs of prejudice. He (Mr. Cardwell) was therefore certain that his noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton) had acted in the manner he believed would, on the whole, best conduce to the efficiency of the corps. The Regulations of the Volunteer Force had placed the power of recommending individuals for commissions in the hands of the Lords Lieutenant, whose practice it was to consult the commanding officer of the corps with reference to the character and the fitness of the applicants for the position they sought to obtain. He was sure that the hon. Member for Leicester, however much he might have disapproved the circumstances of the present case, would not desire to take this power of recommending persons for commissions from the Lords Lieutenant, who, by means of the commanding officers, ascertained the local feeling of the district with respect to the fitness of the applicants much more accurately than the Secretary of State would be able to do. The hon. Member for East Worcestershire (Mr. Lyttelton) had said that Lord Lyttelton did not dispute the general bearing of this Resolution, but thought that if it were agreed to its effect might be misapprehended. The House was not under the necessity of expressing any formal opinion upon the Resolution, because the first Motion before them was that they should go into Committee of Supply. He was satisfied that the hon. Member had no desire that any slight should be shown to Lord Lyttelton; and as it was quite clear that Lord Lyttelton was perfectly free from any of those nonsensical notions which might be supposed to be entertained by persons inclined to oppose the Motion, he trusted that the hon. Member would withdraw it.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, it was impossible for anyone who enjoyed the friendship of Lord Lyttelton to hear that anything like censure was about to be passed upon him without the greatest anxiety. As the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Lyttelton) was the son of the noble Lord, it was possible that some persons might think that the remarks he had made might be open to some suspicion, and therefore he (Sir John Pakington) felt bound to express an opinion upon the matter. He earnestly hoped that the explanation which had been given would be considered satisfactory by the hon. Member for Leicester. He could assure the hon. Member that no gentleman in Worcestershire would be found to join in a censure on Lord Lyttelton.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he had stated distinctly that he had not the slightest intention of casting any reflection on Lord Lyttelton. When he gave Notice of his Motion, he did not know that noble Lord was Lord Lieutenant of Worcestershire; but the moment he heard that Lord Lyttelton was the Lord Lieutenant, he said he did not believe the mischief could be traced to him (Lord Lyttelton), as he was the last man in the country who would adopt an unworthy course. After the statement of the Secretary of State for War, he should ask leave to withdraw his Motion.
